

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

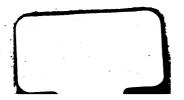

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at http://books.google.com/

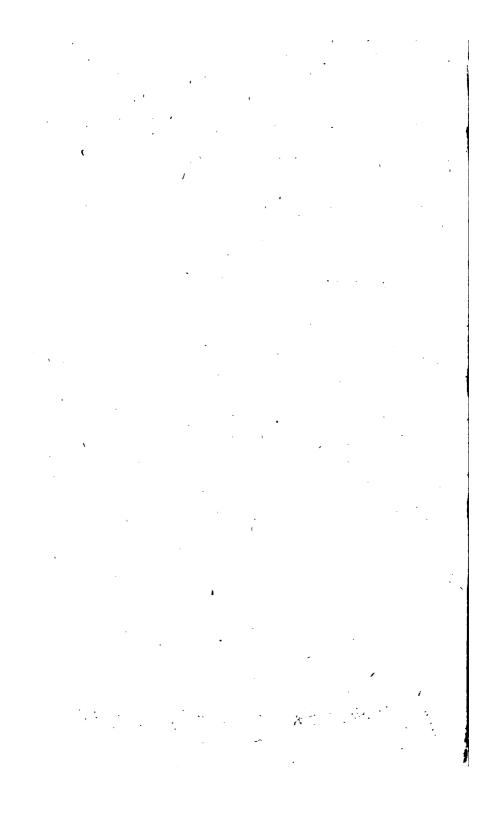

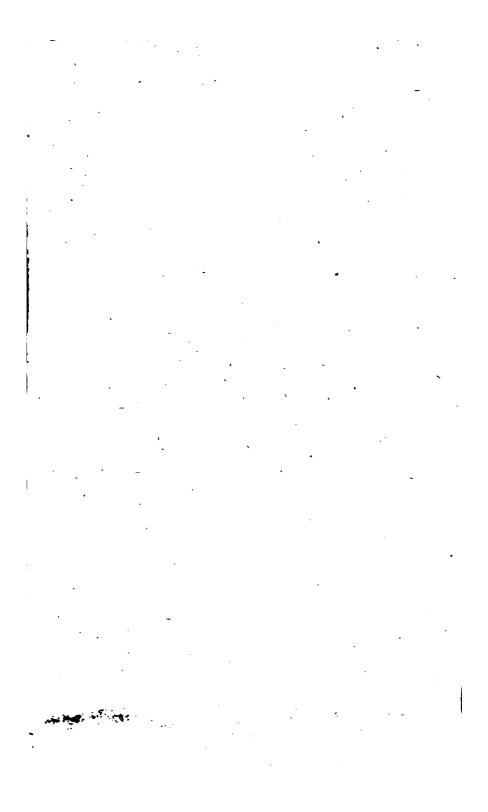

QZ

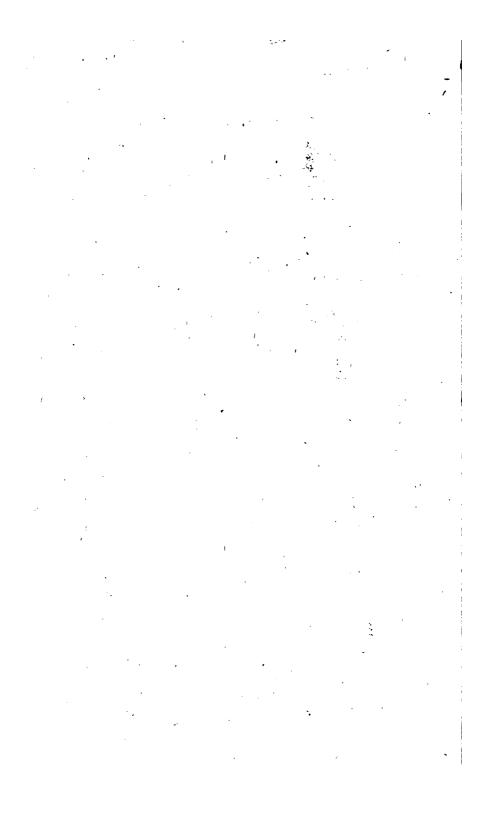

12400 e.120

INTENT AND PROPRIETY

OF THE

SCRIPTURE MIRACLES

CONSIDERED AND EXPLAINED,

In a SERIES of SERMONS,

Preached in the Parish Church of St. MARY LE-BOW,

In the Years 1769, 1770, and 1771; '

For the LECTURE founded by

The Hon. ROBERT BOYLE, Efq;

By the Rev. Dr. HENRY OWEN,

Rector of St. OLAVE, Hart-Street.

And FELLOW of the ROYAL SOCIETY.

IN TWO VOLUMES.
VOL. II.

L O N D O N,

Printed by W. Bowyer and J. Nichols:

For J. and F. RIVINGTON, in St. Paul's Church-Yard.

MDCCLXXIII.

:

CONTENTS

O F

V O L U M E II.

S E R M O N XIII.

PSAL. lxxviii. ver. 56-59.

Yet they tempted and provoked the most high God, and kept not his testimonies:

But turned back, and dealt unfaithfully like their fathers: they were turned afide like a deceitful bow.

For they provoked him to anger with their high places; and moved him to jealoufy with their graven images.

A 2

When

CONTENTS.

When God heard this, he was wroth; and greatly abborred Israel. p. 1.

SERMON XIV.

PSAL. Ixxviii. 70-72.

He chose David his servant, and took him from the sheep-folds:

From following the ews great with young, he brought him to feed Jacob his people, and Ifrael his inheritance.

So be fed them according to the integrity of his heart; and guided them by the skilfulness of his hands.

p. 27.

SERMON XV.

Hosea v. 5.

The pride of Israel doth testify to his face: therefore shall Israel and Ephraim fall in their iniquity: Judah also shall fall with them.

p. 55.

SERMON XVI.

JER. xxiv. 5-7.

Thus faith the Lord the God of Israel—I will acknowledge them, that are carried away captive captive of Judab; whom I have fent out of this place into the land of the Chaldeans for their good.

EONTENTS

For I will set mine eyes upon them for good; and I will bring them again to this land: and I will build them, and not pull them down; and I will plant them, and not pluck them up.

And I will give them an heart to know me, that I am the Lord: and they shall be my people, and I will be their God: for they shall return unto me with their whole beart.

p. 85.

S E R M O N. XVII.

John iii. 2.

Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him. p. 11L

S E R M O N XVIII.

MATTH. IX. 2.

And behold they brought to him a man fick of the palfy, lying on a bed: and fefus feeing their faith, faith, said unto the fick of the palsy, Son, be of good cheer; thy fins be forgiven thee. p. 133.

CONTENTS.

SERMON XIX.

Rом. xii. 2.

-That ye may prove, what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God. p. 157.

SERMON XX.

Rom. vii. 22-25.

For I delight in the law of God after the inward man.

But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin, which is in my members.

O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God through fesus Christ our Lord. p. 183.

SERMON XXI.

2 TIM. i. 10.

And hath brought life and immortality to light, through the Gospel. p. 207.

SER-

S E R M O N XXII.

2 TIM. i. 10.

Who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light, through the Gospel.

p. 233.

S E R M O N XXIII.

MARK Xvi. 20.

And they went forth, and preached every where; the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with figns following. p. 259.

S E R M O N XXIV.

2 Cor. iv. 3.

If our Gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost.

p. 285.

ERRATA in Vol. II.

P. L.

17. 4. undertakings;

32. 6. Ahimelech's

37. 14. on the worship

58. 3 after confirmed dele the comma.

75. 1. Thus faith

P.

98. Note . 1. ult. according

191. l. ult. dislodged Ibid. Note • l. 1. his 497. l. 13.

235. l. antepen. shall,

SERMON XIII.

PSAL. Ixxviii. ver. 56-59.

Yet they tempted and provoked the most high God, and kept not his testimonies:

But turned back, and dealt unfaithfully like their fathers: they were turned afide like a deceitful bow.

For they provoked him to anger with their high places; and moved him to jealoufy with their graven images.

When God heard this, he was wroth; and greatly abborred Ifrael.

WHAT influence or effect the foregoing manifestations of divine power actually had on the minds of the Canaanites, we are not expressly told. From certain cir-Vol. II. B cumstances cumstances it should seem, that they had indeed but very little; if, perhaps, any at all. For it is particularly remarked, that " there was not one city that made peace with the children of Israel, save the Hivites the inhabitants of Gibeon: all the rest they took in battle. For it was of the Lord," fays the text, " to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle, that he might destroy them utterly h:" that is, in other words—as they were a vile and obstinately wicked race, that would not accept of the terms proposed, God therefore judicially permitted their obtlinacy to operate and run its course; to imbolden and urge them forwards, notwithstanding the miraculous warnings they had received, " to fight his people" to their own destruction.

SERMON XIII.

1

But how famili so ever the effect might be, which these mighty wonders produced on the Canaanites; yet certain it is, that they wrought most powerfully on the children of Israel: and, as appears from their conduct

h Josh-xi- 19, 20-

on the supposed desection of some of their brethren, changed that propensity, which they had formerly shown towards idolatry, into an utter dread and detestation of it.

Happy would it have been, had they always continued in this disposition; which the law and its fanctions had a peculiar tendency to cultivate and maintain. But their zeal gradually abated; and expired at length (at about twenty years from the death of Joshua) in a shameful, and almost universal apostasy. The source of their apostasy was derived from hence—that they not only spared the idolatious nations, whom they were commanded to destroy; but, conversing with, and mingling among them, served their idols, and learned their works."

The first palpable defection broke out, it seems, in the tribe of Ephraim, and the house of Minah ; who erected for his own

i Josh. xxii. 112-31.

k Judg. ii. 10—13.

¹ Pfal. cvi. 34-36.

m Judg. xvii. 1-13.

SERMON XIII.

use a kind of oratory or tabernacle; placed in it two images and toraphim; and, having made an ephod and other habiliments, confecrated one of his sons (till he procured a Levite) to officiate as priost in this heterogeneous service. I call it heterogeneous, because it evidently consisted of the worship of God and the worship of idols, united and blended together.

In a short time after, this species of idolatry was fully adopted, as the whole surniture of the oratory was carried off, by the northern branch of the tribe of Dan. For "they took away the graven image, and the ephed, and the teraphim, and the molten image, which Micah had made, and set them up in their own city; where the Levite and his sons were priests, until the day of the captivity of the Land;" or, as it is commonly understood, and might originally have been written, "till the day of the captivity of the Ark!—" till the time that God, as the Psalmist speaks, "forsook," in his anger, "the tabernacle of Shiloh; and delivered his strength," his ark, "into captivity; his glory into the enemy's hand "."

^{*} Vide Selden, De Diis Syris. Syntag. I. cap. 2.

[&]quot; Judg. xviii. 14-30.

Nor were the other tribes less faulty in this respect, than those we have already mentioned. For "they also forsook the Lord God of their fathers, who had brought them out of the land of Egypt, and followed other gods; the gods of the people that were round about them. They served Baalim and Ashtaroth;" that is, the heavenly bost; and particularly the fun and moon; whom they publicly adored with all the formalities of heathenish rites.

This base, idolatrous worship naturally corrupted their moral principles; and led

An ancient Transcriber might easily mistake MINIT for YINIT, and so produce the present Reading; which yet agrees neither with the following verse, viz. ver. 31—nor with the truth of history. See the Commentators.

⁴ Pf. lxxviii. 60, 61.

^{*} Judg. ii. 12, 13.

ō

them on, especially as there was then no power to control them, into all the indulgences of lust and sensuality; into the foul commission of the most flagitious crimes,

Of this we meet with a deplorable instance in the history of the tribe of Benjamin; who. dwelling with the Jebusites, and adopting their manners, degenerated so far, and to so vile a degree, as nearly to approach the character of Sodom. For they not only rushed. prompted by the rage of brutal passion, into the horrid crimes of adultery and murder; but afterwards, in their cooler hours, and even under the weight of a fober remonftrance, had the affurance and effrontery to avow their deeds, and to stand up in defence of their abominations. Such wickedness, it is true, the other tribes were as forward to punish, as this was resolute to defend, But the whole was apparently from the Lord; that he might avenge himself of their evil doings. For fince both parties had, in their several degrees, repeatedly transgressed the covenant of the Lord, and thereby incurred his resentment; he therefore wisely and judicially ordained, that they should now become mutual scourges to each other. And as their sins and transgressions were chiefly owing to their mixing and conversing with the heathen nations; so is it worthy our particular notice, that the tribe of Judah, which sirst exhibited a bad example in this way, was expressly commanded "to go up sirst," and begin the attack upon Gibeah: in which attack it seems to have sustained, as it justly deserved, a greater loss than any other.

⁵ Judg. xvii. 6. xviii. 1. xxi. 25.

^{1.} Ibid. xix. 22-24.

[&]quot; Ilid. xx. 12-14.

^{*} Judah was the first, who, doubting the promises of God, failed in his duty of expelling the Canaanites. For when "the Lord was with Judah, and he had driven out the inhabitants of the mountain, yet be proceeded not (so the text should be rendered) to drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron." Judg. i. 19. Et fic, quod peccarunt, non potuerunt expellere, &c. says the Targum in locum. But Barak, selying on the divine affishance, afterwards overthrew the host of Jabin, though it was supported by no less than nine bundred chariots of iron. Judg. iv. 13—16.

Judg. 38. 18-21.

But this chastisement, however severefor it nearly extirpated one tribe, and greatly weakened all the rest-was yet insufficient to reduce the Israelites to a sense of their duty, and of the allegiance they had vowed to God, For "they ceased not from their evil doings, and from their stubborn way ";" but obstinately perfifted both in their idolatrous and vicious mactices, as if nothing had been done to reclaim them. Nay, they proceeded fo far, as not only to make a league with the Canaanites; but, in open defiance of the law, to make likewise intermarriages with them: the consequence of which was, as it had been long foretold, that they were drawn away, not merely to worship other gods in conjunction with their own; but even totally to neglect, totally to "forget the Lord their God, who had done fuch great things for them."

Hereupon then, "the anger of the Lord was kindled against his people; insomuch that he abhorred his own inheritance. He gave them over into the hands of the heathen, who grievously oppressed them, and had them in subjection ... Yet nevertheless, fuch was his goodness and loving kindness, that, whenever they repented, and returned to their duty, " he regarded their affliction "," and raised up judges to be their deliverers. But, on the other hand, such was their folly and amazing perverseness, that the Judge, who had delivered them, was no fooner dead, than they revolted, and lapsed again: and again experienced the same calamities. So that the whole of this period was, in fact, nothing elfe, but an alternate succession of finning and repentance on the part of the people, and of favour and feverity on the part of God. But "these differences of administration," so wifely adjusted to their character and conduct, will evidently appear, on due reflection, to be equally subservient to the purposes of the main designto the suppression of idolatry, and the advancement of true religion.

^{*} Psal. cvi. 39---41

b Ib. ver. 43.

^{*} Judg, ii, 16-;9,

30 SERMON XIII.

What it really was, that occasioned such defections among the Israelites; that prompted them so frequently to forsake their God, and run into the idolatrous customs of the nations, it is no easy matter to determine. But whether you suppose, that they thought the service of the true God a strange, rigid, and burdensome institution; and were therefore unwilling to bear it a: -Or, that the temptations of the heathen worship (its pomp, fplender, and amusement, so agreeable to the corrupt inclinations of nature) operated upon them with such enchanting force, as they were not able to refift: -Or, that the longconfirmed prejudice in favour of local deities, and their superfittious reverence for the guardian gods of great and prosperous nations, led them to embrace and adopt their rites, in vain expectation of being made happy by them :- Which ever of these you fix upon d See Bp. PATRICK's Comment on Judg. ii. 12.

See Pyle's Pref. to Paraphr. on the Old Testament, vol. iv.

See Bp. WARBURTON'S Div. Leg. vol. iv. Book v. § 2. p. 187, &c.

as the chief fource of their idolatries; you will find, in the present dispensation of Providence, a powerful corrective applied to each. For,

If the grandeur and prosperity of the Asfyrian empire allured them to adopt the Asfyrian deities, in hopes of being advanced, by their benevolence and favour, to the like degree of eminence and power; what method can you conceive more proper to convince them, that fuch deities could neither befriend nor support them, than this which Providence now employed?—than his delivering them up into the hand of Cushan, king of Affyria; who enflaved and oppreffed them for eight years together? In the course of which time they must needs perceive, that the gods they had chosen, were so far from affording them relief or profit, that they were really the cause of their thraldom and distress.

If their superstitious veneration for local deities led them to worship the gods of Canaan, for fear of fome vengeance, which these gods, if neglected, might inflict upon them h; how clearly did the Almighty, by fecuring them, when obedient, from all calamities; and by afflicting them, when they deviated into fuch strange services, with every kind of evil; how clearly, I say, did he evince the futility of this notion? How manifestly did he shew them by these proceedings, that there was nothing which they ought in reason to dread, so much as the vengeance of him alone, who had declared himself to be "a jealous God?"— A God that would never fuffer his honour to be transferred, with impunity, to another: A God that could, and did stir up the very worshipers of these local deities, whom his people had foolishly adopted, to avenge the affronts, which they had repeatedly offered, by their base defections, to his divine majesty.

If the splendor and magnificence of the heathen worship, or the sensual rites with which it was celebrated, allured the Israelites to a finful compliance; how fenfible of their errour must they needs become, whenever they found, as they always did, that they were debased thereby in their nature as men; and depressed in their condition as members of the community?

⁴ Judg. vi. 10. 2 Kings xvii. 35, 38.

And lastly, if they deemed their ritual, and the inflitution they were under, a hard, rigid' and burdensome service; how powerfully must the punishments, that attended their apostaly, serve to correct and reform fuch opinions? For furely they could not but acknowledge, that it was far better, far easier, and more comfortable, to worship the 'Lord in honour, affluence, and prosperity; than to serve and adore other gods, in oppression, affliction, anguish, and distress:-Afflictions that were always the more severe, as their revolts were more frequent, prefumptuous, and provoking.

Now, as these inflictions tended to rectify their wrong principles, and to call them off from their idolatrous practices; fo did that exuberance of mercy, which God exempli-٠, fied in his readiness to relieve their miseries, kindly invite, and warmly encourage them to amend their lives, and again embrace his worship and service. For "when he saw their adversity," and found them disposed to return to their duty, " he heard their complaint," and redreffed their grievances. No fooner did they feek the Lord, but they experienced his kindness in a speedy deliver-And in every deliverance he wisely contrived, that they fould clearly fee the power of his arm; and be convinced to whom they awed their fuccess. He left them indeed, in most cases, so little to do for themselves, that they could never attribute the glory of the act to their own prowefs; but were always obliged to "afcribe to his name the praise" and the honour of what had been done.

Thus, when they assembled in a body of above thirty thousand, and purposed to attack the Midianites; God, who had determined to grapt them success, yet resused to employ so large a force, for fear of diminishing his own glory. He therefore reduced them to three bindred men, to whom he vouchfafed a complete victory i: and vouchfafed it in fuch a manner, as a made his power known among the heathen, and his wonders among all people k."

So likewise, when he commanded Barak with ten thousand men to fall on the confederate forces of Jabin!; though much might be owing to the valour of the lifraelites, who chased and slew them with a great slaughter; yet, God took care to make it appear, that they were indebted for the victory to his affishance. He visibly espoused their cause; and made the gentile gods the instruments of his vengeance on these gentile idolaters. For "the stars" and elements "fought against Siserah"—" the tempest and hailstones beat down part of his host;

[·] Judg. vii. 2-7.

^{*} Pfal. xcvi. 3.

¹ Judg. iv. 14, &cc.

n Judg. v. 20, 21. Joseph. Ant. Jud. lib. v. c. v. § 4.

16 SERMON XIII.

and the swellings of Kishon swept away numbers of the sugitives ".

Such marvellous interpolitions, so critically exerted in favour of the Israelites, and so accurately adapted to the exigences of their condition, did not only serve "to make known unto the sons of men the glorious majesty of the Lord, and the greatness of his excellency;" but also to engage all the wise and considerate among them, "to look up to, and place their considence in, him" alone: as being well assured, that "there was no other god, that could uphold and deliver after this sort."

n The like interpolition of divine power, and displayed for the same end, was afterwards visible in that marvellous victory, which JONATHAN obtained over the Philistines at Michmath, I Sam. xiv. 6—23. As also in that wonderful discomsiture of the united forces of Moab and Ammon, which basely invaded the land of Judah, in the days of Jehoshaphat. 2 Chron. xx. 1—24. To this head may be referred likewise the miraculous influx of water into the valley in the wilderness of Edom, for the support and refreshment of the consederate armies that were going against Moab, &c. 2 Kings 11. 16—20.

[•] Dan. iii. 29.

With respect to the sairecles, wrought as the request of particular judges, to assure them of success, or to encourage them in their undertikings; and which therefore may be looked upon as so many spisodes, or digressions from the general dispensation; the propriety of these must be explained by, as it depends upon; the genius, temper, and situation of the persons, for whose sake they were so performed. And if we view them through this medium, they will appear to be wisely and perfectly adapted to satisfy the doubts of those desponding commanders, and to answer the ends for which they were exerted.

If the distressed Gideon, for example, thought, that "the Lord had forsken his people;" and, because they were suffered to be so grievously oppressed, doubted almost the truth of the miracles, that were said to have been sormerly wrought in their savour?; what surer sign could he wish to be shewn, in proof that God was still among them, than that of his bringing "fire from the > Judg. vi. 12, 13.

Vol. II.

rock ?"

SERMON XIII.

rock!?" And fince he now faw, that miracles were not ceased; how fully must be be convinced, that the Lord could as easily described the Midianites, as he had then confumed the materials of his facrifice? And lastly, what stronger assurance could be possibly obtain, that God would be with him, and prosper the enterprize he was going upon, than this gracious token of his acceptance of him?

And if Gideon's affociates (who were, probably, most of them shepherds; and joined him, perhaps, at the time of shearing) wanted to be confirmed in the truth of his commission; how graciously did the Lord, by rendering "the sleece wet or

113.44

^{. . 9} Judg. vi. 21.

[&]quot;The most ancient and evident token of God's acceptance, was his consuming the facrifice by fire. Hence, where we read, Gen. iv. 4. that "God had refeet unto Abel's offering;" THEODOTION says, institutions, "he fired it." See Gen. xv. 17. Lev. ix. 24. I Kings xviii. 38. I Chron. xxi. 26. 2 Chron. vii. 1. See also Servius in Æn. xii. ver. 200.

dry," condescend to indulge their request? And how suitably was the proof adapted both to their capacities, and their profession?

Hence then it appears, that these manifold exertions of divine power; whether displayed in support of particular judges, who were all, by the bye, strenuous reformers: or manifested for the deliverance of the people in general, when duly fenfible of the heinousness of their apostaly, and penitently disposed to return to their God: hence, I say, it appears, that all these wonders, on whatever occasion at wrought, yet ultimately conspired, and with no small efficacy, to promote that great and gracious end, which was the constant aim of divine government: I mean, the prefervation and improvement of the true religion, in opposition to the reigning ido-·latry.

But

⁵ Judg. vi. 37—40. That this miracle was chiefly intended for the fupport of his doubtful and timid people, is plain from the next chapter, ver. 3.

But there is another event still to be confidered; which, as it closes this part of the divine dispensation, places likewise the intention of it in a clearer and more obvious light. In the days of Eli, the people of Israel, by the remissions of discipline, and the bad examples that were set before them, became excessively profligate and impious. This excess of wickedness provoked the Almighty to deliver them up into the hands of the Philistines; who, in a pitched battle, not only overthrew them with a great slaughter; but, to complete their missortune, took from them the ark of God.

Now, this event, if not counterbalanced, must inevitably prove an unspeakable detriment to the cause of religion. For the Israelites, we may presume, would continually have deviated more and more from the pure worship and service of God, when they saw he was departed from them. And the Philistines, however they might dread

1 Sam. iv. 10, 11.

him

had him before, yet, viewing him now in the contemptible light of a vanquished captive to their own deity, must lose all farther venegation for him. In this critical fituation of things, when the Jewish reconomy scems to have been brought to a full fland; may we not reasonably expect, that God would interpole in some extraordinary manner, as well to vindicate his own authority, as to restore the ark to his despairing people? It is furely natural to expect it: nor are we left to expect in vain. For, when the Philistines

" We read a Sam. iv. 7, 8. " And the Philistines were afraid; for they faid, God is come into the camp. And they foid. We unto us: who shall deliver us from the hand of this mighty God? This is the God that smore the Egyptians with all the plagues in the wilderness." Such is the reading of our present Hebrew copies: but furely this reading cannot be true. For the Egyptians never reached "the wilderness;" and therefore could not be finition with plagues" there. The fact is, that the Hebrew transcribers have been guilty of a grievous omission; which is in part supplied by the Arabic version, but more fully abus by the Chaldee paraphrale. Qui pescullir Asyrptics in omni percussione, et popule suo fecit mirabilia in deserro. Hence it is to be hoped, that fome Heb. MS. will be found at last to exhibit the following fupplement—העמד עשה לפלאוה במדבר. C_3 had carried the ark to Ashdod; and had placed it, as a fignal monument of his victory, by the image of their god Dagon; behold, the next morning, they found their god, fallen from his pedestal, and lying prostrate before the ark x. An evident token of his inferiority and fubjection! But evident as it was, his deluded votaries were yet blind to it. The following day brought them, however, fuller evidence. For when they faw him again in the same posture of humiliation, difmembered of his head and hands, they could no longer doubt, that his fall was owing to the prevalence of that God, that prefided over the ark; and whom Dagon had neither the policy to evade, nor the power to withstand.

When the Lord had thus vanquished him, if I may so speak, in his person; he then proceeded to triumph over him likewife in his kingdom. Dagon was the god

1 4

^{. * 1} Sam. v. 2, 3.

y 2 Sam. v. 4.

of husbandry; and supposed to preside over the fruits of the earth: therefore the Almighty, to expose his weakness, caused a prodigious number of mice to spring up, and ravage the fields; which, seeble creatures as they were, yet, maugre all his divinity, devoured entirely the produce of the ground—sparing neither corn nor plants.

Seeing these alarming wonders, the Philistines, perhaps, might think it now particularly advisable to detain the ark, as a means of engaging this superior deity. But God soon convinced them, that he chose not to reside among them. For he smote them with sore and heavy plagues till the ark was dismissed; and shewed the concern he had for its return, by restraining the rage, and directing the steps of those

C 4

² Δαγών öς ἐςι Σῶὸν, i. e. frumenti præses. Phie. Byb. apud Evers. Præp. Evang. lib. I. c. x. p. 36.

^{* 1} Sam. vi. 5. Joseph. Apr. Jud. lib. vi. с. i. § 1.

b 1 Sam. v. 6—12. Pfal. lxxviii. 66. See also Herodot. Clio, c. 105.

unruly kine that were yoked to the care.

The Philistines, being eased on the departure of the ark, were thoroughly sensible of the hand that chastised them: nor could they well forget in a short time the mighty power and energy of it. But when they did forget, and made another assault upon the Israelites; they felt it again in a dreadful storm of thunder and lightening, attended with strong concussions of the earth, which not only dismayed, but totally overthit them.

Mor was this mercale better suited to remind the Philistines of the supremacy of Jehovah; then it was to consum the very same truth to his own people; who were but just reclaimed from the idolatrous worship of the holf of heaven. Reclaimed however they were; and, after all their fluctuations, brought at length, under the wife and vigorous administration of Samuel, to a settled course of piety and virtue. An effect, which, at the same time that it shews the intention of this branch of divine government; demonstrates likewise the suitableness and propriety of those wondrous manisestations, by which it was supported and carried on. And hence we discover on the whole, as well the patience and long-suffering, as the wisdom and power of God. To whom, for these, and for all other instances of his marvellous kindness, be ascribed, as is most due, all honour and glory, adoration and praise, both now, and for evermore. Amen.

c 1 Sam. vi. 10-15.

¹ Sam. vii. 10. Joseph. Ant. Jud. lib. vi. c. ii. § 2.

The control of the co

SERMON XIV.

PSAL. Ixxviii. 70-72.

He chose David his servant, and took him from the sheep-folds:

From following the ews great with young, he brought him to feed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance.

So he fed them according to the integrity of his heart; and guided them by the skilfulness of his hands.

THE Israelites, under the vigorous administration of Samuel, were brought at length, as we have already seen, to a tolerable notion of the pre-eminence and so-vereignty vereignty of the true God; to a tolerable fense of their obligations to him; and in consequence thereof, to a tolerable regularity of life and manners. This conduct on their part, maintained by the prophet's close application, disposed the Almighty to be favourable unto them; and to bless and prosper them for a long season.

When Samuel was afterwards advanced in years, and grown unequal to the burden of his office; he committed the government of the Israelites to his sons. But these sons of his, elated with power, and the Ifraelites in general, debauched by prosperity, unhappily forgot themselves; and fell into base and wicked practices. His fons became vain, unjust, and luxurious ; and the people, ungodly, refractory, and ambitious. In the ardoor of their ambition, eager of shiring in princely grandeur, and of sharing the distinguished offices of state; the heads of the tribes, taking umbrage at the unwarrantable conduct of his fons, tumultuoufly accosted the venerable prophet, and arrogantly dee 1 Sam, viii 3. Jospen. Ant. Jud. l. viec. iii. § 2.

manded

manded a king. The theoracy no longer fuited their humour. They wanted a government of another form. And nothing would now content them, but a regul one. A King must be set over them, to rule and judge them, like all other nations ?"

This insolent demand, founded in reality on pride and ambition, and not on any contern for the state, was no less displeasing and offensive to God, than it was to his upright and zealous prophet. And to both on the same account: because the establishment of a king after the manner of the nations, was the reassest way to lead them again into the customs of the nations; which would have deeply affected the growth and welfare of the true religion.

But infolent as it was, God, however, complied with their demand is and, referring Itill the chief direction in his own hands, appointed them a king; who should rule and govern them as bis deputy. .. And here f 1 Sam. viii. 5, 20.

[#] Ib. ver. 6, 7.

h Ib. ver. 9, 22.

again, as the preservation of the economy, the great point in view, manifestly required, that both king and people should closely adhere to their religion and law; and faithfully obey the commandments of God; fo he strictly enjoined them, in a special charge, to " attend diligently to these things i:" and then shewed them by a miraculous storm of st thunder and rain at the time of wheat harvest's," that, whenever they offended, God had still a right to chastise them; and would accordingly do it, as often as their transgressions called for it. "If ye do wickedly, ye shall certainly be confumed, both ye and your king 1." A plain intimation that they were to look upon their king in the light only of God's deputy—and as one who was therefore bound, if he meant to preserve his dominion and power, to conduct himself with caution and prudence, and act conformably to the divine laws.

^{1 1} Sam. xii. 6---15.

k Ib. ver. 17.

¹ Ib. ver. 25.

In the appointment of their first king. God seems to have regarded the notion they entertained of royal majesty; and to have made choice of him accordingly, after the Eastern mode, because of the stateliness of his form and appearance. For the Scripture acquaints us, that "when Saul stood among the people, he was higher than any of them from the shoulders and upwards ";" that is, he wasvery tall, and of a majestic stature: the endowment that we find principally celebrated in all the accounts of Eastern monarchs."

But whatever external accomplishments he possessed, his turn of mind was but ill adapted to the great purposes for which he was raised. He was so deeply prejudiced in favour of the policies of the neighbouring nations, that he became impiously cold and negligent in the support and advancement of the law of God. This is apparent from several instances:—from his hasty con-

m 1 Sam. x. 23

^a See Herodot. lib. vi. с. 20, 7%. Alex. ab Alex. lib. iv. с. xxiii. and the Commentators on the place tall quoted.

tempt of the prophet's injunction, and his prophane usurpation of the priest's office .; from his false compassion to those sinners, the Amalekites, whom God had commanded him to defroy ; from his barbarous flaughter of Abimelech's family, and all the inhabitants of Nob 1, and from his burning that facred facerdotal city with fire; as if he meant to diffolve at one stroke the whole Tyftem of eftublished worship; "and render the tabernacle," as Josephus observes, "destitute both of priests and prophets." Instances these, which clearly prove, that he paid little or no regard to the divine conflitution of his country; and, consequently, was no longer fit to be intrufted with the guardianship and government of it.—God therefore depoted him: and raifed up another in his flead of a quite contrary character. He chose David his servant, and took him away from the sheep-folds:" took him,

^{• 1} Sam. xiii. 8---14.

P Ib. xv. 9.

^{4 1} Sam skii 15---19-

^{*} Antig. Jud. dib, si. c. sii. § 7.

[&]quot; that

" that he might feed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance." He chose him. because he foresaw, that he was properly disposed to become "his servant;" his true and faithful deputy: and he advanced him to this eminence, that he might shew his fidelity in the vigorous support of the divine dispensation. Nor did David herein ever In this respect he was certainly a fail. " man after God's own heart:" and however faulty in other things, " as touching the LAW blameless." His zeal for the theocracy was invariably strong. And as he laboured earnestly to promote the service of God, himself: so did he endeavour to insuse into his people the same concern and affection for it. "He fed," that is, taught "them" the principles of religion, "with a faithful and true heart; and ruled," that is, guided "them" in the practice of it, "with all his skill and power,"

Had they then, who have been so forward to revile the character of David, but

• Phil, iii. 6,

Vol. II.

D

duly

duly considered the great end for which he was advanced; and also observed, with impartial eyes, how strenuously he laboured to promote that end; they must doubtless have acknowledged, that, in his public conduct, he fully answered the divine appointment; perfectly accomplished the divine intention; and justly merited that glorious title, with which the Scripture honours his memory.

.. He is called "the man after God's own heart," because he acted " according to that which was in his heart." Now, humanly fpeaking, what was uppermost in God's heart, but the establishment of his dispensation? And what could any man do more for the support and advancement of the divine dispensation, than David is known to have done? He suppressed idolatry throughout all the land: he established the worship of God at Jerusalem: and to engage his people the more effectually in this worship, he continually improved both the order and magnificence of it, till he brought it to an amazing perfection. He likewise composed a Book a Book of Psalms; which, being publicly recited first in the tabernacle, and then in the temple, tended to exalt the religious fentiments and affections of the people, at the fame time that they expressed his own; and thereby contributed in an eminent degree to the growth and advancement of folid piety. For, as some of these Psalms, by setting forth the praises and perfections of Jehovah, helped to inspire his affembled worshipers with higher notions of his glory and greatness; and consequently with a deeper sense of their dependance upon him ; fo others again, by recalling nature to its proper office, and directing the several parts of the universe to recognize and celebrate the God that made it :: ferved to remind the same worshipers of the faith and allegiance they owed him: ferved to with-hold them from . perfidiousness and apostasy; from running back into the ancient idolatries, and abusing the creation to the dishonour of the Creator.

Pf. civ. cxlv. cxlvii.

Ibid. cxv.

Z Ibid. cxlviii.

36 · SERMON XIV.

In a word, David was a man of noble endowments and excellent dispositions; all calculated for, conspiring to, and bent upon, that one great purpose of promoting the knowledge and service of God; and, by means thereof, perpetuating the welfare and happiness of his people. Faults, we grant, he had a few: the effects of which he feverely felt. But in the main tenour of his life, it must still be confessed, that whatever could be done, either by precept, example, threat, or encouragement, for the suppresfion of vice, and the propagation of true religion—this he was zealoufly careful to perform, and conscientiously diligent to put in execution.

He was likewise careful, that the same good principles should be instilled into his son; and solicitous that he should as upon them. Accordingly, when he resigned the kingdom into his hands, he exhorted him to fortitude and manly resolution in the government and regulation of it. And, well knowing that true religion was the grand support of true fortitude, as well as the source fource of national happiness, he solemnly charged him, with his dying breath, to pay a strict and faithful obedience to all the laws and commands of God; and to continue stedsast in his duty to him.

Solomon attended to his father's advice; and went on, for a time, in a manner perfectly agreeable to it. He built a magnificent temple for the Lord; and graced the fervice of it with all the embellishments of folemn pomp and engaging splendour: and thereby kept the people in willing obedience to the laws, as well as in a regular attendance on worship, of the great and true God.

Now, if we seriously contemplate these religious institutions, planned by David, and persected by Solomon; and consider, at the same time, how effectually they were adapted, by their natural agency, to carry on the dispensation of Providence; we shall immediately perceive, that there was no need, during this period, of any miracles to support or advance it. Nor indeed do we read of any: unless you think proper to include in that term, the wonderful accomplishments of those manifold promises, that were graciously made and annexed to obedience. Of these, as we might well expect, we meet with numerous and frequent instances—not only in the amazing successes which uninterruptedly attended the Israelitic arms; and in the consequent extension of the kingdom to its predicted boundaries: but also in various other effects, which signally contributed, while the people placed their considence in God, to their national security and happiness.

7 1 Kings ii. 1---4. 1 Chron, xxviii. 9.

But to see these wonders in their true light, and discover their suitableness to the ends proposed, we must look back to their sirst commencement; consider them in the order in which they arise; and compare them with the circumstances to which they are related. Their commencement I six at the Exode; for then it was, that the Israelites,

^{2 1} Chron. xiv. 8---17.-- xviii. 1--13. 1 Kings iv. 21--24.

Israelites, being taken for a peculiar people, became entitled to peculiar distinction.

And here we are to observe in the first place, that when the Israelites were ready to depart from Egypt, as they had lived long in poverty and oppression, they were, doubtless, but ill provided for their journey. Whatever might be their due, indigent was their condition. They had neither clothes to put on, nor money to buy food. In this fituation they evidently wanted a large supply. And that supply was graciously and providentially administered to them. For the Lord enjoined them " to demand of the Egyptians" (in balance probably of their just rights) " jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment. And he gave them favour in the fight of the Egyptians; so that they readily granted them whatever they required." Thus they marched out, by the kind and special influence of heaven, suitably accommodated and amply supplied.

But notwithstanding the provision, that was made for them in this respect; yet,

* Exod. xi. 2, 3. xii. 35, 36.

D 4

when

when they marched out, they marched, we know, burdened and defenceless-" with their lumber on their backs b, and nothing else but staves in their hands." They wanted therefore the fecurity of weapons. For they were destined to travel through wild, difficult, and dangerous places; and to work their way at last into the possession of a country, which could only be obtained by force of arms. But how were these arms to be procured? By what possible expedient could human policy contrive to furnish so large a multitude ?? and yet furnished, somehow, they must needs be. But what human policy could not effect, divine Providence easily accomplished. For when God overwhelmed the host of Pharaoh, his chariots and his horsemen in the Red Sea: he caused that fea, by closing behind upon them 4, to drive their

b Exod. xii. 34,

About fix hundred thousand men. Exod. xii. 37,

The sea began to open for the Israelites, from the Arabian shore; and began to close again upon the Egyptians, from their swan shore; for in their return they are said "to see against it." Exod, xiv. 25, 27. By this means the wind and the current drove.

their bodies, together with their armour, full on the shore where the Israelites stood. The Israelites stripped them, and accounted themselves:—and were thus prepared (which is a striking circumstance) to vanquish Canaan with the arms of Egypt.

These marvellous instances of divine favour, displayed towards them on their first outset, were excellently calculated to create in the Israelites (which was very needful) a pious hope and firm reliance on God in all future occurrences.

And in the land of Canaan, fingular occurrences did frequently happen, arifing from drove them directly towards the Israelites, "who saw them dead upon the sea shore:" ver. 30. that is, upon the Arabian shore, where they then stood. A circumstance savourable to the Israelites on various accounts—not only as it supplied them with sufficient arms, and valuable spoils; but as it exhibited a proof to the nations on this side the sea of the vengeance which God had taken on the Egyptians for their opposition to his people; and then, as it served to strike a terrour into all around; and dispose them the more readily to submit to their terms and proposals; or, if they refused, to forewarn them of the dreadful consequences.

^{*} Joseph, Ant. Jud. lib. ii. c. xvi. § 6.

SERMON XIV.

42

the fingular conftitution of their law; which, without the immediate protection of heaven, must necessarily have exposed them to heavy distresses.

On their first entrance into that land, they were commanded to renew the rite of circumcision; which gave them a title to the inheritance of the country, and freed them from the reproach of being any longer slaves. But, notwithstanding the privileges it brought with it, how strangely impolitic must it seem, how excessively dangerous must it appear, in the eye of common prudence, to circumcise at once a whole army!—that is, to render them totally incapable of fighting, at a time when their enemies were full in view, and might instantly fall upon them! But here we see, let human

Huc facit, quod Deus populum, recentem a circumcisionis vulnere, sic allocutus sit, (Josh. v. 9.) Hodie abstuli opprobrium Agypti a vobis: hoc est, "ritu illo vos in civium meorum numerum adoptavi, ingenuos et terræ selicis hæredes declaravi, et omnia ser hus Ægyptiacæ (dedecoris et opprobrii vestri) signa delevi et monumenta." Spencer de Leg. Hebr. lib. I. c. v. § 2. & § 5. Vide et Josephi Antiq. Jud. lib. v. c. 1. § 11. in textu et notis. Ed. Havercamp.

human policy say what it will, that piety is the strongest guard, and obedience the best security. For now, in reward of their ready compliance, and also as an encouragement to farther considence; God, who commanded the rite to be performed—and surely nothing less than the positive command of God could induce the general then to perform it—defended them throughout, by his gracious protection, from all the missfortunes and dangers that might attend it. He kept the Canaanites still and quiet within their own walls, till such time as his people were healed, and sufficiently able to attack them. But to proceed—

When they had gained possession of the promised land, where their law was to operate with its full force; they were strictly enjoined by a particular precept in that law, to suffer their ground to rest uncultivated, at the return of every seventh year : which was therefore called the sabbatic year. Now this precept was not only contrary to the common rules of rustic œconomy; but seems to be also productive of many great and grievous inconveniencies. For if the Jews were forbidden to "sow their ground, or prune their vineyards every seventh year;" the confequence must necessarily be, that, unless they were supported in some extraordinary manner, they would often be liable to numberless hardships in those years, for want of bread, and other provisions h. But God, who gave them this singular precept, and whose chief aim in giving it was to preserve in their minds a constant sense of their dependance on himself, promised to reward their observance of it with a double increase the year pre-

SERMON XIV.

b Lev. xxv. 20.

i So I understand, Levit. xxv. 21. "I will command my bleffing upon you in the fixth year, and it shall bring forth fruit for three years—"i. e. for the end of the fixth, the whole seventh, and the beginning of the eighth; which make in all two years; and for which a double increase was sufficient. Mr. Whiston (in his Josephus, vol. iv. p. 524, &c. 8vo.) supposes that something is wanting in the text, relative to the year of jubike; and says, that God here promises, he would not only give the Jews a double crop on the common fixth year, preceding; by which the distresses, that might otherwise happen, were entirely and seasonably prevented. And this promise never failed them, whilst they observed the condition on which it depended. For when they suffered the land to enjoy the rest of the seventh year; "their barns," on the sixth, "were filled with plenty; and their presses burst out with new wine ". But whenever they transgressed in this point, whenever they profaned the sabbatic years, to supply seed for suo years; for that fixth year itself; and for the following ordinary faventh, or fabbatic year: but that he would moreover give them a triple crop on the extraordinary fixth year, to supply food for three years: for that fixth year itself, and for the suo following years of rest, the fabbatic year, and the year of jubilee. Others however affirm, that the year of jubilee never followed the fabbatic year; but was always co-incident with it: which, if true, entirely overthrows Mr. Whiston's interpretation; and superfedes the necessity of the correction he proposes. But after all I must needs consess, that I still suspect there is some errour in the text. For "if they sowed the eighth year," ver. 21, they only wanted "the increase of "suo years; whence it should seem, that, by an early mistake, whence it should seem, that, by an early mistake, whence k Prov. iii. 10.

their affairs took instantly another turn!. Though they sowed their fields, and pruned their vineyards, yet the produce was, to speak in the language of the prophet Haggai, "as when one came to an heap of twenty measures, and behold there were but ten; or, as when one came to the press-fat, for to draw out fifty vessels, and behold there were but twenty. For God smote them with blassing, and with mildew, and with hail, in all the labours of their hands "."

Now these distributions of plenty and scarceness, adjusted to the character and conduct of the Jews, whilst they rewarded their observance, or punished their neglect of this precept, plainly demonstrated that the precept itself was derived from God:

Their neglect of this law for feventy Sabbatic years is reck-, oned among the chief causes of their seventy years captivity in Babylon; when the land recovered the full respite, of which they had deprived it before. Comp. Lev. xxvi. 34, &c, with 2 Chron. xxi 21.

m Ch. ii. 16, 17.

plainly demonstrated, that God presided over their nation; took particular cognizance of all their actions; and would always recompence them as their works deserved. And so far, we see, contributed to support and advance their religion.

But the principal support of their religion and government was manifestly derived from their folemn festivals; which, at the same time that they inspired them with gratitude to God, united them in friendship with each other, and compacted them firmly in one It was therefore of the highest importance that these sacred solemnities should be regularly observed. And hence we find, that " all the males from the age of twenty, were required to appear before the Lord three times a year "," to acknowledge his mercies, to rejoice in his favour, and to offer up the tribute of thanksgiving to him. Now the fingularity of this law is not more remarkable, than the danger of observing it was obvious and alarming. For when the men were removed, at these stated periods, from all quarters to the center of the kingdom, to what dreadful invalions were their borders exposed! and how easily might their enemies ravage their country! But as he, who appointed these solemn assemblies, had promised the Jews, that "no man should defire their land," when they went up to the celebration of them o: so their constant experience could witness for him, that he never deserted them at such times: could witness for him, that he impressed the nations around with terrour; and thereby preserved his people at ease, and secured their land from all molestations.

n Exod. xxiii. 17. Deut. xvi. 16.

Such wonderful instances of paternal regard, exercised towards them on all occasions, plainly shewed them, how much it was their interest, as well as duty, to rely constantly on God's protection, rather than on their own strength. Whilst they depended upon it, they were always safe; but whenever "they made slesh their arm, and in • Exod. xxxiv. 24.

their

SERMON XIV.

their hearts departed from the Lord p," their hopes continually failed them; and they were fure to fuffer and fmart for their folly. Thus, when David in a fit of vanity, commanded the number of his forces to be taken, which manifestly implied, that he prided himself, and placed a degree of confidence in them; how foon was his pride and arrogance checked! and how feverely was his folly punished! a grievous pestilence feized his people; which, by fweeping away feventy thousand of them together 4, effectually taught him to rely no more on the multitude of his host; but to look up stedfastly for the future to that God, who is the Lord of hests: to that God, "unto whom alone power belongeth;" and who, with respect to the Jews, always delighted "to make his strength appear perfect in their weakness r." To forget him therefore now in their prosperity, and vaunt themselves in their own abilities, was evidently a fin of an

Vol. II.

heinous

P Jer. xvii. 5.

^{9 2} Sam. xxiv. 15.

r 2 Cor. xii. 9.

heinous nature, and deservedly called for this signal punishment; a punishment which shewed them, how frail and weak they really were; and how much it was their wisdom, in their best condition, to rely on the savour and protection of God.

And indeed, to give them their due, they became so wife from henceforth, as to place a full and implicit confidence in their great and gracious protector; and to pay him a willing, unfeigned obedience. They went on improving in religion and virtue; and were accordingly bleffed with a proportionable increase of wealth, happiness, and honour. These they enjoyed without interruption. " For they had peace on all fides round about; and they dwelt fafely, every man under his vine, and under his fig-tree, from Dan even to Beersheba '." The Canaanites became also tributaries to them, and eased them of their fervile employments; whereby they were all in a manner ennobled, being favoured with admission into the offices of state t. They lived moreover in high esteem with all the nations far and near, who honoured them with large and magnificent prefents, and stored their houses with the choisest goods". They carried on a very extensive trade; which brought into the kingdom such immense riches, that "Solomon made silver to be in Jerusalem, as stones *;" that is, of little value, because of its abundance. Nor did other things, perhaps, abound there in less profusion. "For king Solomon exceeded" all the kings of the earth, for riches, and for wisdom : and his fubjects, partaking of this wisdom, and making themselves eminently religious, were now also, in consequence, eminently happy.

^{3 1} Kings iv. 25.

Their happiness stood always annexed to their observance of the law. And since the law had now its perfect influence upon them; and was magnified in the abundance of those ^{&#}x27; 1 Kings ix. 20-25.

^{*} Ibid. x. 25.

² Ibid. 27.

⁷ Ibid. 23.

good works, which its precepts engaged them to discharge; their obedience was therefore attended with the accomplishment of its promises, in the full enjoyment of all temporal selicities. In short, whilst the inhabitants of Judea strove to make it a land of holiness, God took care to make it likewise a land of plenty—the pride and glory of the whole earth.

A plain demonstration this, of the divinity of the constitution under which they lived. For who, but the Lord of the whole earth, could thus reward the piety of his servants with all the blessings that earth can bestow?—But here let us remember, that they were then his servants; and were no longer blessed, than while they continued such. For though we have now seen to what a glorious height their "righte-ousness exalted the nation z;" yet the next discourse will exhibit a clear and woful proof, how soon their "sin" became not only the shame and "reproach," but also the ruin "of this very people." Equally gracious however will the Lord appear, both in his judgments, and in his mercies.— To him therefore be ascribed, as is most due, all honour, glory, adoration, and praise, both now, and for ever-more. Amen.

z Prov. xiv. 34.

. •

SERMON XV.

Hosea v. 5.

The pride of Israel doth testify to his face: therefore shall Israel and Ephraim fall in their iniquity: Judah also shall fall with them.

W E have feen the Ifraelites, about the middle part of Solomon's reign, advanced, in confequence of their piety and virtue, to an eminently glorious and happy state. But this state was, alas! of no long continuance. For their prosperity soon debased their principles, and corrupted their morals to a strange degree. The king, interest the state of the stat dulging his lustful inclinations, "grew mad in his love of women." These foreign women seduced his heart from the true God; and attached him to the service of their false deities. Hence idolatries of various kinds, together with the abominations attendant upon them, spread and prevailed over the whole land; and insected the mass of the people.

As their wickedness increased, their happiness declined: insomuch that the kingdom, which had once been so greatly admired for the order and excellency of its government, gradually sunk, through the vices of its inhabitants, into a factious, unsteady, and tottering condition.

On the death of Solomon, ten of the tribes revolted from his fon, and made Jerohoam their king. The kingdom, which Jerohoam obtained by rebellion, he determined to establish by apostasy. And therefore, to prevent his people from going up to the temple at Jerusalem, which might sayour.

¹ Kings, xi, 4-8,

b Įbid, xii, 20,

then union again with Judah, he set up two golden calves, on the plan of worship he had learned in Egypt, to which they might sacrifice in their own country.

This base defection God was highly incenfed at. And to apprize Israel of the effect of his refentment, he fent a prophet to Jeroboam, at the time he was engaged in the first act of innovation, and standing before his altar at Bethel: who foretold them in the name of the Lord, that, "the days were coming on, when the false priests should themselves be slain; and their bones burnt on that very altar." And this event, he affured them, would as certainly come to pass, as that "the altar should then break asunder, (which instantly happened) and the ashes upon it be poured out:" Nor should it ever be in the power of any of their kings to prevent this calamity; but every hand, that endeavoured to oppose it, should be enfeebled and deadened, as they now faw the e 1 Kings xii. 26, 27.

⁴ See PATRICK's Comment on the place.

^{* :} Kings xiii. 1-5,

58 SERMON XV.

hand of Jeroboam, for his attempt on him. who declared these tidings.

This warning, confirmed, by fuch a complication of miracles, must have been sufficient, one would think, to awaken the Israelites; and bring back that deluded people to the worship and obedience of the true God. But so infatuated were they now grown, that they still persisted in their former impieties; and even proceeded to higher provocations.

They harasted Judah by continual wars; and industriously employed every possible advantage against them. The accession of Abijah s, who was young and inexperienced, afforded them an opportunity too favourable f 1 Kings xv. 6, 16, 17.

Abijah (z Chron. xiii. 1.) is in 1 Kings xv. 1. &c. called Abijam—which difference, as the Jews wrote on raled vellum, may be easily accounted for. The space between the two sides of the sinal [7], being silled up by the dark ruled line, the transcriber mistook it for a mem [7]. This is observed, not so much for the fike of the word in question; as for the sake of many other and more important variations which may be accounted for on the same principle.

to be overlooked b. They collected therefore a numerous army; and malevolently marched against him, in considence of being able to fubdue at once the two tribes, and bring them entirely under their own power. Now had they prospered in this attempt, their success would have been fatal to the: cause of religion; as it would probably have involved the whole land in one general apostasy. God therefore, who saw their iniquitous design, was pleased to deseat their scheme; and to grant Judah a perfectly marvellous and unparalleled victory. For they flew in this engagement, five hundred thousand. of their enemies; and took Bethel, the feat. of their idolatry, among others of their strongest cities. A slaughter, which not only manifested the herceness and severity of the divine displeasure against these ten idolatrous tribes; but also reduced their authority; and power to a balance with the other two. And this balance was afterwards preferved all the while tolerably even, as well by the fucceffes which Judah, when obedient, enjoyed; as by the frequent calamities which befel Israel, on account of their repeated and enormous sins k. For they never ceased, notwithstanding these severe, though merciful inflictions, from their detestable impieties and wicked works.

A Joseph. Ant. Jud. lib. viff. c. xi. § 2,

² Chron. xiii. 2—20.

2000

But, impious as the kings of Israel had been, yet Ahab exceeded all his predecessors. For to the idolatries of Jeroboam (whose chief fault consisted in worshiping the true God by a soolish representation of his own invention) this king superadded the worship and service of strange deities. He adopted the gods of the Sidonjans and Tyrians; set up the worship of Baalim and Ashtaroth; that is, of the sun, moon, and stars; and laboured to restore that ancient idolatry, which the Israelites had been raised on purpose to destroy.

The accession of those, out of the other tribes, who seared the Lord, and came to Jerusalem, contributed likewise to the same end. See 2 Chron. xi. 16, 17.—xv. 9.—xxx, 11, 18.

^{1 1} Kings xvi. 30, 33, Joseph. Ant. Jud. l. viii. c. xiii. § t.

Whilst he thus madly counteracted the scheme of Providence, Elijah was sent to reprove his folly. This zealous prophet, it should seem, expostulated the matter warmly with him: asked him on what principles he forsook the Lord; and what benefits he expected from his adopted deities? Is it in their power, says he, to bless and fertilize your country? "Can the vanities of the Gentiles cause rain? or can the beavens give showers "?" To convince you that they cannot; "as the Lord liveth, before whom I stand," and whose minister I am, "there shall be neither dew nor rain these years, but according to my word."

When they had sufficiently experienced the impotence and futility of their own deities; and had suffered severely by drought and famine for the space of three years; Elijah came to them with a promise of relief, provided they returned to God and their duty. But as he wished their reformation might be sounded and established on due conviction; so he dem Jer. xiv. 22.

[&]quot; I Kings. xviii. 1.

fired Ahab to convene Israel, and all the priests, at a particular place on mount Carmel. The people being accordingly assembled, he accosted them in the following terms: "How long will ye halt between two opinions? If Jehovah be God, follow him: but if Baal, then follow himo." "Now, that ye may be satisfied which of them is really God, we'll put them both to the trial. You, who are his prophets, maintain, that Baal, the sun, is the true God. The essence of the sun is fire: and surely, if he can display himself in any thing, it must be in that. Le that then the test;" "the God that answereth by fire, let him be God?."

This was a rational method of decision; adequate and suitable to the point in controversy: and therefore what the people could not but approve. The proposal being thus assented to, the priests of Baal prepared their sacrifice; "and called on the name of their god from morning even until noon—nay until the evening: but there was no voice, nor any that answered, nor any that regarded 9."

^{° 1} Kings xviii. 21.

P Ibid. ver. 24.

Then Elijah, having so disposed and ordered his facrifice, as to prevent all suspicion of deceit, came up to the altar, which he had just erected, and prayed unto the Lord, that he would now, for the conviction of this deluded people, manifest himself to be the only great and true God: which he had no sooner done, but " a fire fell down from heaven, and confumed the victim, wood and stones; and dried up all the water in the trench. When the people faw it, they fell on their faces, and cried out-Jehovah, he is the God! Jehovah, he is the God!" And so fully were they convinced of this truth, that they instantly seized the prophets of Baal; and, at the command of Elijah, •• put them all to death "."

Now,

¹ Kings xviii. 29.

[&]quot; Joseph. Ant. Jud. lib. viii. с. xiii. § 5.

^{&#}x27; i Kings xviii. 38-40.

As the times of Elijah and Elisha were particularly troublefome and distressful both to the prophets and people of the Lord, we meet, with many more particular and detached miracles under

Now, as this miracle had so powerful an effect on the conduct of the people; it is hardly to be supposed, that the king re-under their administration, than in any other similar period of the Old Testament. But these distinct and particular miracles, being sounded on the particular occasions of the times, may easily be explained from the nature of the circumstances under which they were exhibited. They were principally intended either, for a proof of the prophet's mission, as when Elisha divided Jordan. 2 Kings ii. 13, 15. Or—for the prophet's support, security, and protection. 1 Kings xvii. 2, 16. xix. 5, 8. 2 Kings ii. 9, 12. vi. 13, 24. Or,—as an honourable testimony of God's approbation of the prophet's character. 2 Kings ii. 8, 11. xiii. 21. Or—for the relief, comfort, and encouragement of the faithful, 1 Kings xvii. 9, 16, 24. 2 Kings ii. 19, 22. iv. 1, 7. Ibid. 16, 17. Ibid. 32, 37. Ibid. 40, 41. Ibid. 42, 44. vi. 4, 7.

These particular miracles, at the same time that they answered these particular purposes, served also to demonstrate both the power and providence of God; and consequently to strengthen the faith and considence of his people:—and so far therefore conspired to promote the design of the general dispensation. This is more especially observable of the two last miracles, that respectively concerned these two eminent and zealous prophets: for the hope of immortality was strongly consirtined by the ascent of Elijah into heaven; and the doctrine of the resurrection by Elisha's bones raising up a dead man to life—which being done publicly, was a farther consirmation of that private miracle of his raising the son of the good Shunammite. 2 Kings viii. 1—64 And the like had been done by Elijah. 1 Kings xvii. 17, 23.

mained

mained altogether uninfluenced by it. continued, it is true, to act wickedly: but not with the same obstinacy. His heart relented. For, when he heard his doom, "he humbled himfelf;" and began to be forry for the evils he had done. This repetitance God was graciously pleased to encourage by a marvellous deliverance now vouchafed to him, and his people. Benhadad, the king of Syria, invaded Israel with a large army; and imperiously threatened to demolish their capital; and lay it at once level with the ground. But his infolence was foon reprefied. For the Lord animated and strengthened the Ifraelites; who, by making a fudden attack on their enemies, put them all to flight; and obtained over them a completé victory ".

This victory was gained in so extraordinary a manner, that the Syrians themselves could not but ascribe it to the power and agency of the God of Israel. But this God they fancied, according to the common superstition of the times, to be only a local tutelary deity—a god of the hills, but not of the vallies *:" and therefore determined to try their fortune another year in a different and lower fituation. His omnipotence being thus disputed, God judged it necessary to shew them, on their own principles, that his power was not confined to the mountains, but extended equally to the plains. With this view he placed the Israelites in the plain: of Aphek; where they fought the Syrians again; and, though amazingly inferior in number, overthrew them with a dreadful flaughter; for an hundred thousand fell together in the field of battle. And of those who fled into the city, twenty-feven thoufand perished in so strange and singular a manner, as visibly demonstrated, that the hand of God was extended against them, and immediately concerned in their fall and destruction z.

" 1 Kings xx. 10-21.

A fimilar deliverance, from the power and oppression of the same king, was again

^{* 1} Kings xx. 23.

y "The children of Ifrael were numbered, and were all prefent, and pitched before them, like two little flocks of kids; but the Syrians filled the country." Hid. ver. 27.

² lbid ver. 28-30.

vouchfased them in the next reign, by means equally marvellous.

But, notwithstanding these, and many other favourable interpositions; exercised towards them at various times; yet, so degenerate were the Israelites grown, that they perversely continued their impious practices; and, forgetful of that "goodness which should have led them to repentance," indulged themselves in all kinds of wickedness. This depraved and perverse toudust exposed them to numberless calamities, "10" the depredations of the sword, pestilence, and samine; calamities, which served, as well to correct, as to punish, their iniquities.

idols in hopes of fecuring their help and fitvour's how clearly must they perceive, that "there was no help in them," when they found shemilelves labouring under the hand of the oppositor! Or, if they engaged in their fervice, as they often did; from a fond conteit, that the fertility of the earth, the salue ^{* #} Kinge vi. z4---vii. 7.

See 2 Chron. xxviii. 23.

brity of the scasons, and the prosperity of human affairs, depended on their benign influence; how plainly must the falshood of this persuasion appear, when they experienced their idolatries to be constantly attended with essective the reverse! For we never read of their following idols, but we likewise read of the heaven's becoming dry, the earth unsruitful, the scasons unhealthy, or the state unsuccessful.

Such was now the condition of Israel: a condition, one would imagine, sufficient to deter any people from adopting and imitating their manners. But idolatry is contagious. And so from Israel the contagion spread; and unhappily infected the house of Judah.

The kings of the two tribes had hitherto, in general, maintained a pious regard for God, and dutiful obedience to all his laws; and had consequently enjoyed, through his e See Jer. xliv. 17. Hol. ii. 5, 12.

Lev. xxvi. 14---20. Deut. xi. 17.—xxviii. 24, 25. 1 Kings viii. 35. Jer. xliv. 15---23. Ezek. vi. 11---14. Maimor. Mor. Nevoch. p. iii. c. xxx.

good providence, great fuccess, prosperity, and happiness—which was particularly the case of those pious princes, Asa and Jehoshaphate. But Jehoram, having married into the family of Ahab, foon deferted the way of his fathers; foon neglected the worship and service of the true God; and, at the instigation of his wife, introduced into the kingdom foreign customs, to the increase and propagation of the most horrid impieties, and the utter ruin of the institutions of his country. For "he made high places in the mountains of Judah; and caused the inhabitants of Jerusalem to commit fornication;" that is, idolatry—" and compelled all Judah and Benjamin to do the same :" which proved the fource of great and lasting misery to himself, and of bitter afflictions to all his people.

The next reign was equally wicked; and was therefore involved in equal misfortunes.

^{° 2} Chron. xiv. xvii. xix. xx.

f 2 Chron. xxi. 11, 14, 15.

And henceforth again, as both kings and people went on, in succession, for a series of years, provoking the Lord by their abominable doings; so were they punished with various sorts of oppressive calamities; and rendered proportionably wretched in condition, as they were vile and perverse in their actions.

Some lucid intervals, indeed, of picty thone out in Judah at particular periods; which gave them some little respite from their sufferings; some little taste of peace and happings; and retarded the progress of that small judgement, which had often been denounced against their wickedness.

But the children of Israel were incorrigibly hardened; and, notwithstanding the repeated admonitions they received, and the repeated punishments they suffered, could never be brought by any of these means to a proper degree of penitence or reslection. They proceeded from the beginning, without intermission, in one impious course of apostasy;

^{$ 2} Chron. xxiv. 23. 25 - xxv. 14. 24. xxviii. 5. 8. 16. 21.

apostasy; advancing continually, for two hundred and fixty years, from one stage of wickedness to another—from bad to worse—till they "filled up at last the measure of their iniquities;" and made the land to groan with the burden of their fins.

When "they had left all the commandments of the Lord," and gone thus "into the ways of the heathen h;" God determined to drive them out, as he had driven the nations before them. He called up therefore the king of Affyria, "who came to Samaria, and took it; and carried Ifrael away into Affyria; and placed them in Halah and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes i."

To be carried captive into any country, is, doubtless, a circumstance of deep distress; but that the Israelites should be carried into this country, had something in it, that was peculiarly fore. "It is well known, how they were first in bondage in the land of Goshen, and the city Abaris, in Egypt; and h 2 Kings xvii. 15, 16.

i Ib. ver. 5, 6.

how they were conducted thence into the land of Canaan; which they enjoyed above feven hundred years. Upon their repeated rebellion and idolatry, they were now carried into a fecond bondage: and what is remarkable, many of them went to another land of Goshen; but not like that of old; to another city Abaris or Habor; and in fuccession to the same people, to whom their fathers had succeeded in Egypt, even the Cuseans. Their captivity was attended with this cruel circumstance, that they went now to a wild and uncultivated country: and had the mortification to fee the people, who had quitted it, occupy the pleasant fields of For "the king of Affyria brought men from Babylon, and from Cuthah, and from Ava, and from Hamath, and from Sepharvaim, and placed them in the cities of Samaria: and they possessed Samaria, and dwelt in the cities thereof k." Here was every additional circumstance, to aggravate their misfortune, and embitter their fervik 2 Kings xvii. 24.

tude: to bring to their memory continually what they had been, and what they now were: to point out visibly the finger of God in the peculiar sufferings of such a reprobate people: and at the same time to alarm the remaining tribes; that they might take warning at the sight of such particular judgments, and recollect themselves in good time.

And at this time indeed, the two remaining tribes did thoroughly recollect themfelves; and with diligence apply to the great and necessary work of reformation. The high places were removed; the images were broken; the groves cut down; and every abomination cleared away. The temple of the Lord was opened and purified; the public worship was restored; and the solemn festivals were again celebrated. In short, true religion revived in Jerusalem, and slourished throughout the land: And happiness, the inseparable attendant of piety, smiled upon every condition. As "they drew nigh to God, so God drew nigh to them;" guarded and protected them in all their enterprizes; "and prospered them whithersoever they went"."

¹ Bryant's Observations on the ancient Hist. of Egypt, p. 240, &c.

^{≈ 2} Kings xviii. 4, &c, 2 Chron. xxxi. 1—4.

The prosperous events they had experienced, which were visible tokens of God's favourable presence among them, emboldened them now to throw off the yoke of the king of Asiyria. This king's father, on a revolt made by the Israelites, had before taken and destroyed Samaria; and carried away the inhabitants captive. The fon, who now governed Affyria, thought likewife, on this occasion, to treat Jerusalem in the same manner. Flushed therefore with his former victories, and breathing destruction against the kingdom of Judah, he sent a most opprobrious message to Hezekiah and his subjects—charged with bold and bitter invectives, not only against the Jews, but even against God. Read his own words:

² Kings xviii. 7.

What confidence is this wherein ye trust? If ye trust in God, and say unto me, the Lord will deliver us: then I would ask you, hath any of the gods of the nations delivered at all his land out of the hand of the king of Assyria? Where are the gods of Hamath, and of Arpad?—the gods of Sepharvaim, Henah, and Ivah? Have they delivered Samaria out of mine hand? Who are they among all the gods of the countries, that have delivered their country out of mine hand, that the Lord should deliver Jerusalem out of mine hand.

Here, you see, he brings down the great God of Israel to the contemptible level of the gods of the nations; puts him to open defiance; and charges him with impotence to his face. This then was the time for the Lord to assert and vindicate his honour; to shew forth the greatness of his majesty and power; and to punish the arrogance of this haughty king, who had thus vainly exalted himself, and impiously "contended with his maker." Accordingly, the bold and blafphemous tyrant had scarce advanced to the holy city, but his forces were entirely destroyed. " For it came to pass that night, that the angel of the Lord went out, and fmote in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred fourscore and five thousand men P." An event, which rendered it manifest to the nations, that Jehovah was a God "mighty in power, and tremendous in judgment 4:" And which also served as a proof to the Jews, that their enemies would never prevail against them, unless their iniquities should provoke the Lord to with-hold his favour and protection from them.

^{• 2} Kings xviii. 19; 30, 33—35.

And soon, alas! was he forced by their impieties to yield them up to the punishments

P 2 Kings xix. 35. Some suppose this havock to have been made by a plague, or perhaps by lightning, or a firy wind, which blows sometimes in those parts, and is very destructive. See Sir I. Newton's Chron. p. 282. PRIDEAUX'S Connect. p. I. b. I. p. 24.

^{1 2} Chron. xxxii. 23. Joseph. Ant. Jud. lib. x.c.i. § 4. they they deserved. For in the succeeding reigns, regardless of the deliverance now wouchsafed them, they basely and ungratefully forsook the Lord; polluted his temple by the introduction of idels; tran as into all the abominations of the heathen; and, notwithstanding the endeavours of good Jossah, and the earnest admonitions of holy prophets, observed advanced to as detestable a degree of profanences and iniquity, as ever their brethten of the house of Israel were known to have been guilty of.

When the offences of Judah vied thus with the transgressions of Israel; then the Lord determined invengeance "tostretch over Jerusalem the line of Samaria;" that is, to overthrow the one, as he had overthrown the other: and to consume its inhabitants in like manner—some of them by famine, others by the sword; and to drive the rest into hard captivity. "Therefore he brought upon them the king of the Chaldees, who besieged z 2 Kings xxi. 2—9. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 1—9.

^{4 2} Kings xxi. 13.

the city," and drove them by famine to wretched, fireights. "When the city was broken up, he flew their young men with the fword, in the house of their sanctuary ! and had no compassion upon young man or maiden, old man, or him that stooped for age: he gave them all into his hand. all the veffels of the house of God, great and small: and the treasures of the house of the Lord; and the treatures of the king and. his princes: all these he brought to Babylon. And they burnt the house of Gods and brake down the wall of Jerusalem; and burnt all the palaces thereof with fire; and destroyed all the goodly vessels thereof. And them that escaped from the sword, carried he away to Babylon; where they were fervants to him and his fons 57 ...

XV

Thus "the Lord removed Judah, as he had removed Israel, out of his sight;" and, since they had both been guilty of the same crimes, made them partakers of the same punishment. And if we consider puly what has been already said, it must doubtless appear, t 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17---20.

that it was not without sufficient cause, that he exercised this great, this lasting severity upon them.

But there are other confiderations, not yet particularly mentioned, which leave to vindicate the proceedings of Providence, in the fame degree that they aggravate the pervertences and oblinacy of the Jews. To this purpose then, we are father to observe,

That their calamities came on them by flow advances; and increased in weight, as their fins were multiplied—that they had constant warnings of the feveral judgments before they came; and confrant exhortations. to amend their fives, as the only means of escaping them—that they had the benefit of prophets to fet them right; whose mission was supported by appropriate miracles, land whose denunciations were daily verified by repeated and woful experience what when: they despised the admonitions of the prophets, and hardened themselves against their reproofs; yet God would not reject them at once; but fent them off into captivity by degrees; each kingdom at three different periods; periods"; in hopes that the remainder would take, warning from what was past; and avoid, by repentance, the fate of their brothcen. But when repentance found no place among them; when, "the more they were stricken, they revolted the more;" in a, word, when all these diversified methods of reformation could have no effect upon them; it was furely but fitting, that they, who would continue flaves to their fins, should, in confequence, be made flaves to their enemies; and be taught at last by the miseries they felt, to "know" the difference between "the fervice" of God, and the service of the kingdoms of the countries "." A difference, which might induce them; a difference indeed, which did.

677.

Mrael was carried captive: Judah was carried captive: 1. by Tiglath-Pileser, 2 Kings 1, by Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. i. xv. 29. Years before Christ, 1, 6. Years before Christ, . 606. 2. By Shalmancfer, 2. Kings 2. By Nebuchadnezzar, Esth. ii. zvii. 6. Years before Christ, 5, 6. Ezek. i. 1, 2. Years before Christ, 599. 721. By Esarhaddon, Ezra iv. 3. By Nebuchadnezzar, 2 Kings 2, 10. Years before Christ, xxv. 2. &c. Years before Christ, 48%

* 2 Chron. xii. &

induce

induce them, "to turn again to the Lord their God." For at last they considered, that when they served him, "it was then much better with them than now—" that their former condition was infinitely preserable to that which was their lot at present.

Now, whilst the Jews were learning in their captivity this falutary lesson, divine Providence was graciously employed in correcting the various superstitions of the Cufeans; and leading them to a truer notion of When these mixed people introduced into Samaria the feveral deities of their own countries, and worshiped them according to their own manner; the Lord, jealous of his honour, and concerned to maintain the fanctity of his land, was highly provoked at fuch prophanation; and fent among them a number of lions, by which they were grievously harasted and destroyed. Why he made choice of these animals to annoy them, may not, perhaps, be accounted for with any degree of certainty or precision. But, if we suppose, as we have some reason'

y 1 Kings xvii. 25, 26.

to suppose, that Arioch or Ariel, that is, the Lion-god, was their chief and general deity 2; then the fending lions among them, was a kind of judgment, the most appropriate that we can well conceive: as it served to convince them in the most affecting manner, that "wherewithal aman finneth, by the same also shall he be punished." But whatever might be the reason, for which the punishment was particularly inflicted in this form; yet certain it is, that it produced upon them its defired effect. For it brought them to the acknowledgement of the true God; and to a respectful compliance with his laws and worship. And though they continued, for a time, to join their own gods with the Lord God of Israel; yet did they gradually

The principal deity of the Assyrians was "Agm, or Mars (See Hyde de Rel. vet. Pers. cap. ii. p. 62.) whose symbol was a lion. Josephus says, Ant. Jud. lib. ix. c. xiv. § 3.—xii. c. v. § 5.) that these Cuseans were destroyed by plagues, and not by lions. How he came by this reading I cannot conceive; unless he translated the Heb. ⁹ηΝ by "Agm, which he found to be sometimes used in a sense equivalent to λοιμός, pessis or plague—and then adopted this word as the most common, and best understood. Though, in truth, I suspect it proceeded from a worse cause.

fo advance in knowledge, and ultimately fo improve in piety, as to forfake all their false deities, and confine themselves to the worship of the Lord:—and to the worship of Him only *.

Now to God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, be ascribed, as is most due, all honour, glory, adoration, and praise, both now, and for ever-more. Amen.

^{*} See PATRION's Commentary on 2 Kings xvii. 41.

SERMON XVI.

JER. XXIV. 5-7.

Thus faith the Lord the God of Ifrael—I will acknowledge them, that are carried away captive of Judah; whom I have fent out of this place into the land of the Chaldeans for their good.

For I will fet mine eyes upon them for good; and I will bring them again to this land: and I will build them, and not pull them down; and I will plant them, and not pluck them up.

And I will give them an heart to know me, that I am the Lord: and they shall be G 3 my my people, and I will be their God: for they shall return unto me with their whole beart.

T is natural to infer from the perfections of the Deity, that all his dispensations of every kind, even those which seem the most severe, are founded in mercy, and calculated for the benefit of mankind. Among those of the severer fort, the captivity of the Jews stands nearly in the foremost rank, And yet this dispensation, however distressful, the text assures us, was designed, " for their good:" for the correction of their base idolatry and wickedness; and for their future improvement in picty and virtue. And indeed, if we duly confider its natural influence and moral tendency, we shall find it adapted, with exquiste propriety, to promote that beneficent and gracious and.

The whole Jewish nation, both Judah and Israel, had, as we have seen, so strong and strange a propension to idolatry, that the former dispensations, with all their officacy, could neither correct nor abate it. Now, if this this propensity was either excited or confirmed by that high opinion, which they always entertained of the deities of conquering nations, and particularly those of the Assyrians; then their captivity under that nation must necessarily contribute to open their eyes; and to point out the extreme folly of placing their dependance on such deities.

If they prided themselves in their high privileges; if they imagined, as they certainly did, that, being the peculiar people of God, and inhabiting the city which he had made choice of for his peculiar residence, they must needs in consequence, let their moral character stand as it would, be always secure of his favour and protection is; how fully must they be convinced of the emptiness of this sophistry, when they sound their temple and city destroyed; and themselves cast out into a heathen land; not only stripped of all their honours, but rendered objects of contempt and reproach!

b See Jer. vii. 4, 14. Mic. iii. 11.

4 When

When the grand foundation of their pride and confidence was thus clearly removed away, they began to "think more foberly of themselves;" and beheld their conduct in a different light, from that, in which they had feen it before, through the medium of their former prejudices. For now in their captive, disconsolate state, they had sufficient leifure to "think on their ways." And the calamities they fuffered in that state, would naturally dispose them to reflect with concern on that long feries of iniquity and perverseness, which had brought them under the preffure of this heavy judgment. Now "their own wickedness corrected them, and their backflidings reproved them; now they must needs know and see, that it was an evil thing, and bitter, that they had forfaken the Lordtheir God; and that his fear had not been in them m." And how amazingly must the bitterness of this affliction be increased, when they confidered, that it was owing to their own obstinaty! that their prophets had frequently warned them of it, and strenuously purged them to guard against it! These remonstrances, however neglected and despised before, were not now without their effect. For in the land of their captivity, all that the prophets had formerly urged against their profane and detestable practices, revived afresh in their minds, and sounded again in their ears; and their present abject, wretched condition (the predicted consequence of such practices) sunk them deep into their hearts. And hence must arise an utter detestation of those shameful idolatries and their concomitant vices, which they well knew was the cause of their sufferings.

Knowing then the cause of their sufferings, they had nothing to do, but to quit their idolatries; and endeavour to regain the favour of him, who alone was able to relieve their distresses. But his favour they were sensible could only be regained by making him their sole God; and conducting their lives according to the tenour of that Law, which he had anciently given them. Upon these considerations then, it seems, they repented pented themselves; returned to the Lord; and vowed obedience to all his commands.

To guide and encourage them in the performance of their vows, God continued his prophets among them; and authorized them to declare, that, if they carefully avoided the manifold abominations, which they faw practifed in the land of their captivity; and kept themselves faithful and steady in the fervice of their God; he would then become " a fanctuary to them" in the place they were in; and, at length, "bring them back to the land of Israel ";" where they should flourish again in peace and righteousnefs, as in former times. And this furely was a motive of no small efficacy to preserve them fixed and attentive to their duty. For, as the hardships they felt continually prompted them to wish for the return of those former. days, wherein they lived in ease and profperity; fo the conditions on which that return depended, must necessarily keep their thoughts awake, and their endeavours bent on the accomplishment of them.

If they were tempted at any time to fall off from their allegiance to God; if they were threatened with danger, in case they refused to join the idolatrous worship of the nations; yet, they could not but perceive, that it was as much their interest, as it was their duty, to resist unto the end; and hold fast their considence without wavering.

They had early evidence before them, that "God was still faithful" to his promises, "and would not suffer them to be tempted above that they were able; but would with the temptation or danger, "either make a way" for them "to escape," or endow them with strength sufficient "to bear it." For the miraculous deliverance of the three confessors from the siery surnace, was not only a proof of God's attention to his faithful servants; but also a pledge that he would nover forsake them, in the trials they suffered on his account.

And fince the inftant terrours of perfecution and death were most likely to overcome the weakness of nature, and betray them into sinful compliance; God therefore, in compassion to their infirmities, and for the confirmation of their faith, vouchsafed them a second instance of his regard, in the wonderful protection of the prophet Daniel from the rage and power of the lions?

^{# 1} Cor. x. 13.

P Dan. iii. 16-28.

Now all these seasonable and marvellous exertions manifestly contributed, not only to fix the Jews in a more steady dependance on God and his providence; but also to rouse and awaken the Gentiles into a lively sense of his majestly and power. This sense of his greatness naturally excited in their minds some degree of veneration for him; and perhaps disposed them to permit his people to worship him in their own way, with less molestation, and without reproach. Nay, perhaps, they happily obtained, by the mediation of Daniel, some farther indulgences. For when he advised Nebuchadnezzar, at the close of the interpretation of one of his dreams, to "break off his fins by righteoufness," as a means of "lengthening his tranquillity;" he adds, "and thine iniquities by shewing mercy to the poor "" not to the poor of his own people, as it is commonly understood; but to the emphatically poor and afflicted Jews. And if we consider the regard, which he constantly paid to his faithful counsellor; it is not improbable, that he took his advice; at least when he came to his right mind; and granted them the favour of a free toleration: which must tend of course to promote their religion.

⁹ Dan. vi. 18---23.

¹ Ibid. iii. 29. iv. 37. vi. 26, 27.

But the cause of religion was farther strengthened, at this period, by many other concurring incidents: and more particularly, by those remarkable judgments, which the prophets foretold should befal, and which God accordingly inflicted upon, the kings of Babylon and other countries, who arrogantly exalted themselves against him, and impiously despised his salutary admonitions. "For if God did not spare" these stubborn, refractory Gentiles, "that finited; but cast them down" ignobly from their thrones: the Jews, who were peculiarly bound to obey him, could not but conclude, that he would make a most dreadful example of them, if they should still be so base as to "live ungodly." And this conclusion must now stand the more confirmed, must operate on their minds with more force, when they recollected the sate of their brethren in Egypt; who, by rejecting the counsel of the prophet Jeremiah, and obstinately persisting in the idolatries of that nation, miserably perished in the fall thereof.

Dan. iv. 27. Chald. YJY Comp. Pfal. xxxv. 10.—lxxiv. 21, &c.

And fince they well knew, that the king-dom, which themselves were then subject to, was likewise to undergo great revolutions; it behaved them to attend the more strictly to their conduct, lest their vices should involve them in its approaching calamities. Repentance and obedience were their only security. Nor is there any room to doubt, (for even the principle of self-pre-

fervation

Jer. xliv. 11-28. Predenux's Connecte pe is b. iii. An. 573.

fervation would effectually lead them to it) that they laboured by obedience to make good their title to that gracious promife, which affured them of protection in those perilous times. "Fear thou not, O Jacob, my fervant; and be not difmayed, O Ifrael, faith the Lord: for I am with thee: though I make a full end of all the nations, whither I have driven thee; yet I will not make a full end of thee: I will not leave thee however wholly unpunished; but will correct thee in" such "measure," as is necessary to reform thee."

And hence arose another and very powerful motive, to induce them to proceed with diligence and vigour, according to the intent of this merciful dispensation, in the improvement of their heart and lives. For surely they could not but correct their misdoings, and shew themselves "zealous of good works;" when they understood that their afflictions and distresses were to abate, in proportion as they advanced in the ways of piety.

a Jer. xlvi. 27, 28.

But these were not the only encouragements, which God, in his goodness, proposed to their obedience. Higher motives were placed in their view. "There were given unto them exceeding great and precious promises *: " the promise of restoration into their own land; the promise of plenty, happiness, and security in that land; and the promise of a glorious state and settled government under their own king, Messiah y. " Having therefore these great and precious promises," that by them they might be perfuaded to reform their lives; they must needs be folicitous to " escape the corruption that was then in the world, through" the prevailing influence of " lust 2" and idolatry: they must needs be folicitous to "cleanse themselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit; perfecting holiness in the fear of God," and in gratitude for his abundant mercies.

^{× 2} Pet. i. 4.

y Jer. xxiii. 3---6. Ezek. xxxiv. 12-311

^{2 1} Pet. i. 4.

² Cor. vii. 1.

And though feveral occurrences intervened, which; to those who judged according to the ordinary course of things, might feem to obstruct these promised blessings; yet, to this people they all appeared, by the light of prophecy, to be "working together for their good." For every revolution that threw the nations down in the world. was a prelude to the future advancement of Judah. And they had the comfort to see, under all revolutions, that some persons of their own body were furprisingly advanced into power and authority, to patronize and defend their cause: which, as it shewed, on God's part, great attention to the welfare of the Jews; must naturally excite on theirs a proportionable regard for his honour and glory.

Such was the dispensation of the captivity in Babylon: and such were the measures which God employed, under that dispensation, for the recovery and reformation of his people. And as both Judah and Israel were to be reunited, and reformed together; so the means concerted for their conversion Vol. II.

and improvement were equally applied to both. To forward their union the more readily, and to make the application to them the more easy; God had previously and wisely ordained, that both of them should be thrown, in great numbers, into the same countries: where, losing their former distinction, and mixing together as one people, they enjoyed the benefit of the same discipline, and the same means of instruction in righteousness.

How well these means were adapted to correct their errours, to improve their manners, and to engage them in the service of the true God, is apparent from what has been already delivered. And how effectually they operated to this glorious end, is now become a matter of admiration. Idolatry ceased among them; their attachment to God grew strong and inviolable; and their zeal for his honour active and permanent. In consequence hereof, when they were restored

Proof: viz. that in the expiatory facrifices made at Jerusalem upon their return, "twelve he-goats are said to have been offered, according to the twelve tribes of Israel." Ezr. vi. 16, 17.

testored again to their own land, they thought it not sufficient, merely to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem; but, in the warmth of their piety, proceeded farther; and erected synagogues in different cities, where the law was read on every sabbath, and other acts of devotion were performed. Hereby the true knowledge of God and his religion was improved and confirmed among them; the practice of their duty was impressed and enforced upon them; and their abhorrence and detestation of idolatry became more fixed, resolute, and determined.

Now, while those, who returned to Judea, were thus zealous in the service of God; and setting forth the honour of his majesty, in their own land; the others, who remained behind, were busied in reforming the neighbouring nations; and improving in their minds, those exalted sentiments of the supreme Being, which his late extraordinary and marvellous interpositions had raised and excited among them.

H 2

Being

Being now properly qualified for the work, both these bodies of Jews were appointed a kind of priests—preachers of righteousness, and publishers of the true religion—to the four rising monarchies. For the readier discharge of this high office, and the furtherance of the end designed, they were occasionally intermixed with the several nations; and providentially dispersed through all the provinces of these mighty kingdoms: where, being often distinguished by eminent favours, they were enabled to convey and spread their instructions with greater effect and advantage.

During the Babylonian and Medopersian empires, they not only made a considerable improvement in the religion of the people, who were more immediately their fellow subjects; but also communicated their notions and customs to those inquisitive philosophers and renowned legislators, who frequently travelled through these flourishing states for the acquisition of higher knowledge; and who, it is plain, adopted adopted many of their doctrines and practices themselves, and then recommended them to the notice of others, when they returned into their own countries.

Under the Grecian empire again, as the Jews were favoured with some extraordinary privileges, and often placed in a very conspicuous point of view, so their religion and manners became of course more observed, and more accurately enquired into, especially by the curious and learned; who were then numerous in most parts of the world, and more particularly in Greece and Egypt.

And about this time, that is, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, their curiofity and improvement were most remarkably provided for, by a translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, or at least of the five books of Moses, into the Greek language. And as it appeared, when they were translated c See Gale's Court of the Gent. p. I. b. III. c. ix. &c. Witsii Egyptiac, lib. iii. c. xiii. Arth. Young's Differt. vol. I. p. 292.

into that language, that these books of Moses and the Prophets "contained not only obscure things, and what particularly concerned the Jewish state; but also things of a more splendid nature, and descriptive of the fortunes of diverse kingdoms ;" so is there no doubt to be made, but that these matters rendered them valuable in the eyes of the world; caused them to be read with diligence and attention; and to be sometimes, perhaps, consulted with reverence by those several nations, who sound themselves interested in their contents.

And finally, when it was the fate of Judea to be reduced at length to a Roman province; this people and their religion became no less known to the subjects of that mighty empire, than they had been before to other states. For the indulgence, which they every where obtained, of living according to their own laws, and using their own rites and ceremonies, speedily conveyed a general knowledge of their tenets, customs, and institutions, to all the people around them.

⁴ See Allix's Refl. o.1 the Old Test. b. ii. p. 41,

Thus then were the Jews, under the four great successive monarchies, eminently instrumental in reforming, enlightning, and improving the world. And though they were never able to convert a whole nation together to their church, and make their religion the particular established religion of the country; yet they gained every where an infinite number of proselytes to their law; and many more to the belief and acknowledgment of the one supreme and true God; which was the principal thing then required.

Nay, even the nations, who still continued slaves to idolatry, were highly indebted, though they knew it not, to the benign influence of this falutary dispensation. For what were those exalted improvements, which were made, through the course of this period, in civil and religious knowledge; and which, by the application of phills in the strength of the strength o losohers, amazingly thinned the darkness of heathenism; but lucid emanations, conveyed by tradition, or perhaps derived by a nearer way, from this full and copious fountain of light. And what were those refined inflitutes of morality, planned by the most renowned legislators, and established in several heathen countries, but chiefly transcripts from the Mosaic laws ? So that this glorious dispensation, like the sun, while it shone on one country with meridian rays, and on others in proportion to their distance from it: threw forth moreover fome beams of light, that bent below the horizon; and thereby cheered that thick gloom, in which those people were involved, who had not yet the happiness to behold its orb.

SERMON XVI. 104

- Hence we see, that the most distant nations were far from being neglected or difregarded by the Lord; though he was per

culiarly

Vide MARSHAM. Canon. Chron. Secul. ix. Tit. Lex. Mofaica, p. 150, &c. tet authores ibi laudatos.

Vide HUET. Demonstr. Eyang, Proposit, iv. cap. xi. p. 153, &c. Petit. Com. in Leg. Attic. GROT. in Matth. v. 28. et de Verit. Chrift. lib. i. § 15. 4872 July 1984 culiarly attentive and favourable to the Tows. Indeed the favours conferred on them, were properly favours to the whole world. They were chiefly means to instruct and to improve the Jews, that they might be qualified to instruct and to improve others; that they might become fit instruments in the hand of God, for the propagation of the religion they had in trust: the benefit of which other nations reaped almost in an equal degree, whether this people stood faithful to their trust, or fell for their neglect and violation of it. Nay their fall, in truth, that is, their perverseness and apostasies, contributed rather to the speedier accomplishment of this delign, than could well have been expected even from their steadiness. For to what did their defections ultimately tend; but to supply the Deity with more frequent occasions to exert himself, in the correction of their predominant errours and vices? But their errours and vices were the errours and vices of all mankind. And therefore those wonderful exertions, which God

God employed for the reformation of the Jews, were equally adapted to the conversion of the Gentiles, among whom they lived. Nor did they fail of their intended effect. For hereby, "the name of the Lord became extensively known among the heathen; and his greatness acknowledged by many people."

From what has been advanced it appears, I hope—that God, as the common father of all, made ample provision for the instruction of all: fo far as either their necessities required, or their capacities would admit. It is true indeed, that, throughout these various dispensations of his providence, he acted with a special regard to the Jews; and interested himself remarkably in their welfare. But nevertheless, it is undeniably manifest, from the tenour of his proceedings, that he was not unmindful of other nations. Several instances have already, oc-· curred of his general concern for all mankind; and feveral more might eafily be produced of his particular regard to the Gentiles.

tiles. What are all the exhortations and warnings delivered by the prophets to the furrounding nations, but so many instances of this truth? But why do I mention these? For what was there done, of any moment, towards the conviction and recovery of the Jews, that did not extend, and proportionably contribute to the reformation and improvement of the Gentiles? The miracles wrought in Egypt were fuch as the whole world had a concern in; and fuch as the whole world either beheld or heard of. The wonders afterwards performed in Canaan 44 declared the glory of God to the heathen; and manifested his power to numerous people "." He discovered himself to the Syrians both by goodness h and severity; and the Assyrians were likewise eye-witnesses of his majesty k. Lastly, the miracles displayed in Babylon made him known, not only throughout that province; but even

[&]amp; Pfal xcvi. 3.

h 2 Kings v. 8-19.

i Ibid. xx. 28, 29.

k Ib. xxi. 35,

108 SERMON XVI.

through the extent of the Babylonish empire 1. These miracles, it is granted, were principally performed in favour of the Tows; and to engage them in the service of their mighty protector. But then it must be allowed, that they were also adapted, as they were farther intended, to correct the idolatrous notions of the Gentiles; to convince them, that the God, who could do fuch wonders, must be far superior to all gods; and confequently, that it was their interest to join his people, in order to share his favour and bleffing. Upon these principles, the best disposed and most considerate among them gradually forfook their idols; and came in to the Lord from all quarters of the universe. For thus we are affured by those, who were themselves eye-witnesses of the fact—" that devout men," i. e. worshippers of the God of Israel, met together at Jerufalem, " out of every nation under heaven"."

This was the great and glorious end, which the Almighty had always in view,

¹ Dan. iii. 29. vi. 25-27.

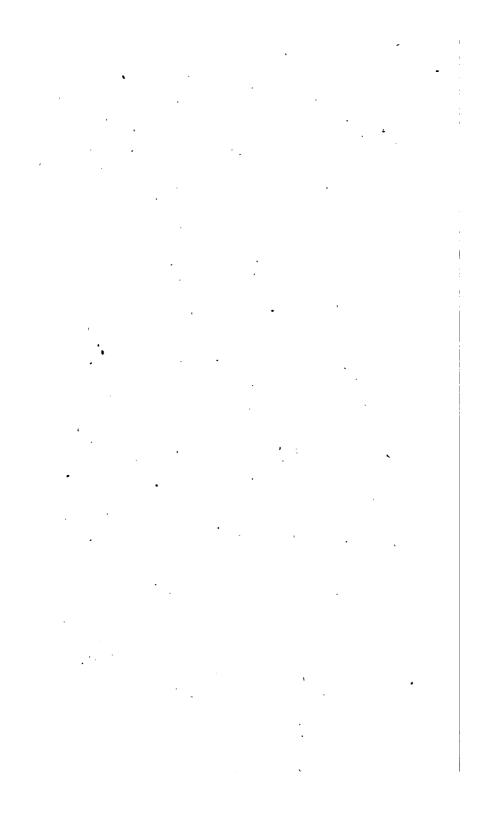

m Acht ji. 5.

in his feveral transactions with mankind. And therefore, when he had finally accomplished this gracious end; when he had acquired a people out of every nation; had redeemed them from their "bondage to the elements of the world;" and had brought them to the obedience and acknowledgement of himself; he then with-held his hand for a time, and closed up this stupendous dispensation.

And now,

"Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, who alone could do such wondrous things; and blessed be the name of his majesty for ever: May all the earth be filled with his majesty! Amen, Amen."

n Pfal. lxx. 18, 19.

SERMON XVII.

John iii. 2.

Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him.

Have endeavoured, in the course of the preceding Lectures, to illustrate the nature, intent and propriety of that vast and extensive chain of miracles, which runs through the Old Testament. If we pursue the progress of divine administration, and enter into the New Testament; we shall there discover another remarkable chain of miracles; miracles; different indeed from the former in their genius and complexion; but equally fuited to answer the end they were intended to serve. For those, which we have already considered, were not more properly adapted to prove; that Jehovah is the one true God, the CREATOR and GOVERNOR of the world; than these, which now come to be discussed, are to demonstrate, that Jesus Christ is the promised Messiah, the Redeemer and Saviour of mankind.

SERMON XVII.

But we must not advance too abruptly:—
For since the propriety of the miracles depends, in a great measure, on the nature of the doctrines, which they were wrought to attest; and since those doctrines have likewise a manifest reference to the moral state and condition of the world; it is hence previously requisite, that we should take a distinct and particular view of the real situation of mankind, at the time of the commencement of this new dispensation—that we may be able to judge what was sit and necessary to be done for the promotion and accomplishment of that design, which is the professed purpose purpose of its institution: that is, what was proper and necessary to be done, for the spiritual improvement of mankind; for their present virtue and comfort, and for their suture persection and happiness.

Now, though the preceding dispensation of providence, as it reclaimed the Jews, and enlightened the Gentiles, was of great and fignal advantage to the world; and actually lessened, in a good degree, the baseness and misery of mankind; yet was it defective in feveral particulars necessary to the perfection and completion of their felicity. As it was originally adapted to the distinct circumstances, and principally calculated for the special benefit, of one particular people; it must therefore be, of course, unsuitable and inadequate to the general necessities of all; even supposing, that all had been so wise, attentive, and industrious, as to make the best and most proper use of it, that it was capable of being applied to. But the truth of the case is; that both parties, Jews as well a Gentiles, were highly blamable in this respect. They wilfully neglected, debased Vol. II. and 1 and corrupted those salutary doctrines and instructions they had received; and consequently sunk, both in knowledge and pratice, far below that measure of improvement, whereunto the dispensation, under which they lived, was intended and adapted to advance them.

SERMON XVII.

114

For the Jews, notwithstanding their industry in making profelytes, and consequently in extending the knowledge and worship of the true God, yet groffly perverted the wife and pious intentions of his law; and rendered it in a manner void and useless. They laid the principal stress upon, and confined their observance chiefly to, the external, showy, and less momentous parts of it; whilst they neglected the internal, weighty, and substantial, to an assonishing and shameful degree. In support of these proceedings they ran out into vain speculations; and thence formed fuch delusive comments on the divine commands, as quite enervated their force and efficacy: and at length confirmed this mode of interpretation by groundless traditions, and the authority of the Rabbins.

bitts. "Thus they made the commandments of God of none," or almost "none effect, by their foolish speculations and "traditions": And, though they retained "the form of godliness, were generally strangers to the power of it?"

In the mean time, the Gentiles, though improved in civil knowledge, and advanced in the cultivation of focial virtues, were yet involved in dangerous errours with regard to religion and a moral life. Nay indeed, when civil knowledge increased among them, religious knowledge (which is something strange) declined, abated, and lost ground 4. During the simplicity of remoter times, men thought it their duty, and made it their practice, to adhere to those venerable and renowned principles, which had been carefully inculcated by their ancestors; and were looked upon as of divine ^{*} Math. zv. 6. Mark vii. 13.

P 2. Tim. iii. 5. See more in Bp. LAW's Theory of Rel. Part II. p. 166. Note (2).

The this proved at large in LELAND's Advantage of the Christian Religion, vol. L. chap. xx. p. 417, &c. 8vo.

FIG SERMON XVII.

original. But when learning and philosophy began to flourish; it made them captious, vain, and arrogant—ready to dispute every point, and to call in question all former positions. When "they became thus sceptical and "vain in their imaginations," they either despised those genuine and truly sublime doctrines, which had passed down from ancient ages; or corrupted them by salse and base mixtures. So, "professing themselves wise, they became fools—"extravagant in theory, and degenerate in practice."

Not that I would be thought to intimate, as if all good principles were extinct among them, and no traces of virtue to be found: For that would be injurious to their real character, and contradictory to the truth of things. Some general notions, relating to the existence and attributes of the Deity; some general ideas of a governing providence, constantly inspecting the behaviour r Rom. i. 22.

[•] Vide CLERIC. Prol. Ecc. Hist. Sect. II. Moshem. de rebus Christianis ante Con antinum. cap. i. § 21.

and conduct of mankind, still remained unextinguished among them. And these notions, however obscured, or however debased, failed not to produce some laudable effects, in laying restraints on vice and wickedness; and keeping up the face of order and regularity in every state. But the point I would inculcate is this—that what passed for religion among the heathens, had no reference to the true God; and no farther regard to good morals than the interest of the state required. And therefore, as Seneca well observes, " that man must fall infinitely short of the perfection of virtue, who measured his goodness by legal right, and the public institutions of his country '."

And though it should be remembered, to the lasting honour of human nature, that there are several instances recorded of men, who, prompted by a happy disposition of temper, and guided by the dictates of fuperior reason, practised higher and more exalted virtues, than ever were prescribed by the laws of the state; yet it must still be confessed, that these instances are comparatively few; and that the bulk of the people did not live up even to that standard of moral goodness, which was erected and established for the rule of their actions. And had they advanced to its full height, how very low would they have then stood on the scale or ascent of virtue! For the laws and institutions of every community, however excellent in some respects, were extremely desective in others. They were all fundamentally wrong in that main branch of moral duty, which regards the fervice, worship, and adoration, that we owe to the great and true God, They were also wrong in the excessive indulgence, which they freely allowed to the tenfual and vicious passions. And they were no less wrong in providing rather for the interest terest of the state, than for the improvement of human nature.

Quam angusta innocentia est, ad legem bonum esse? Quanto latius officiorum patet, quam juris regula? Quam multa pietas, humanitas, liberalitas, justitia, sides exigunt, quæ omnia extra publicas tabulas sunt? Senec. de Ira, lib. ii. cap. xxvii.

Nor was philosophy, with all its admired excellencies, ever able, either to supply the manifold defects of these laws, or to correct their pernicious errours. It had time enough to try its strength; and to exert, to the full, its boasted powers. But it tried and laboured in vain—For, after all its efforts, it "was found wanting:" being often dubious about several points of importance to be settled; and always too weak to enforce even those, which it judged and knew to be right.

Since it appears then, that the Mosaic institution was so far perverted and depraved by the Jews, as to have lost nearly its whole effect on their sentiments, dispositions, and manners: and that the laws and instructions delivered to the Gentiles, were insufficient to lead them to the right knowledge and practice of their duty: how needful was it for the reformation and improvement of mankind, that some higher, more perfect, and more powerful dispensation should be at length introduced and established in the world! And how extremely gracious must it be in the Deity, to support the serious, contemplative, and faithful, by clear and repeated affurances, known to the Gentiles * as well as the Jews, that he had compassionately determined, at a proper season, to send one from heaven to promulgate and establish such a dispensation among them?—A dispensation that should extend to the whole human race: that should correct the mistakes, errours, and prejudices, under which they laboured; that should supply the defects of the former institutions; and convey to the world every thing requisite to life and godliness.

[&]quot; Vide Ciceron. Tuscul. Disput. lib. ii. cap. iv. et v. lib. iii. cap. iii. lib. iv. cap. xxxviii. lib. v. cap. ii.

What these requisites were, may easily be deduced from the situation and circumstances that we find the world to have been now in. And here it is obvious to remark, that when mankind forsook their idols, and became acquainted with the true God, they became likewise sensible of the manifold offences they had committed against him; and consequently sensible of the great and absolute need they had, of obtaining his pardon and forgiveness of them. But the assurance of his pardon they could no otherwise obtain than by an express declaration from himself. And, as no declaration of that kind, no general promise of pardon on repentance, had been made to the world at large before; it was therefore manifestly the first thing, which the state and condition of mankind now required to be done for them. But then it was only the first.

F PLATON. Alcibiad. 2. in fine. JAMBLIC. de Vit. PYTHA-GORÆ, cap. XXVIII. p. 124, &c. Ed. Kuster.

For suppose this necessity supplied—suppose that God, overlooking those times of ignorance and errour, had declared his forgiveness of their past sins, and his readiness to accept them on their sincere repentance; yet, what would that avail, unless they also clearly understood how to serve him acceptably for the suture? And how was it possible for them to understand this, unless he gave them them such a plain, perfect and complete rule of life, as would infallibly direct them to all the duties, which he required at their hands? Such a rule then was another thing they stood in need of, as a necessary guide in the ways of godliness.

Now let us admit, that they had accordingly obtained fuch a rule of life; had got such a perfect system of morals actually delivered to them; yet the known and experienced weakness of their nature would have foon and fenfibly convinced them, that they were far from being equal to the difficulties of their duty;—to the practice of that moral And then, what figuified the rule, or where was the use and benefit of the fystem, unless they were supplied at the same time with an addition of strength, sufficient to enable them to obey its directions? This fupply of grace then, to aid and strengthen the infirmities of nature, was another thing indifpenfably requilite for the attainment of holiness, and consequently of eternal happinels.

But

But suppose likewise, that they were accordingly endowed with this necessary addition of strength, and enabled to act in purfuance of the precepts delivered to them; yet, as the allurements of fense led them astray; and continually prompted them to misapply their abilities; and as the sanctions of nature were too light to counter-balance the force, and to restrain the influence, of these allurements; so it hence plainly follows, that they had great need of some weightier motives to determine their choice, and keep them invariably in the road of duty:-motives sufficient, as well to deter them from the pursuit of vice under its most engaging appearances; as to animate and excite them to the practice of virtue under the most pressing, and formidable discouragements. But fuch motives could only be derived from the clear prospect of another state; in which they were to partake of happiness or misery to all eternity according to their temporal conduct; according as they discharged or neglected the duties, that were here here prescribed to them. This prospect therefore of a future state of rewards and punishments was another point, which the interest of virtue, and the security of human happiness, evidently required to be cleared up, and laid open to the view of the world.

324 SERMON XVII.

But still, as the bulk of mankind had no conception of being either happy or miserable hereaster, but in the same bodies they possess here, which yet they observed to be destroyed by death, so it seems to be moreover necessary, to give these motives their still weight, that proper assurance should be conveyed to the world of a general resurrection to come—when every soul is to be clothed again with its own body, to receive y In terram enim cadentibus corporibus, hisque humo tectis, e quo dictum est humari, sub terra censebant reliquam vitam agi mortuorum—Tantumque valuit error—ut, corpora cremata cum scirent, tamen ea sieri apud inseros singerent, quæ sine corporibus pec sieri possent, nec intelligi. Animos enim per seipsos viventes non poterant mente complecti; formam aliquam siguramque quærebant. Ciceronis Tuscul. Disput. lib. i. cap. xvi.

the things done in that body, whether they were good or evil.

Such then, and so many things were neceffary to the reformation and improvement of the world: things, which the former difpenfations either left wholly unsupplied; or, at best, supplied in so imperfect a manner, as to be of little service in the conduct of life. Whenever therefore that perfect difpensation took place in the world, which God had promifed finally to establish; which was formed to supply all the deficiences of former institutions: and to conduct mankind to the perfection of virtue, as the means of attaining the perfection of happiness: whenever, I fay, that revelation appeared unto men, which was thus intended to reform and improve them; we are unavoidably led to presume, that the forementioned articles, fo necessary to the accomplishment of its grand defign, must make a considerable part of its contents: must be laid down therein with full precision; and proposed with authority to the belief of the world.

SERMON XVII. 126

But then it is to be observed, that no authority could induce the world to accept these articles, as the declarations of God, but that which could exhibit sufficient evidence of their being really delivered by him. And fince miracles alone were looked upon by mankind, as such a perfect and satisfactory evidence; it necessarily follows from the reason of things, that this revelation should be confirmed by miracles: by miracles appropriated to the doctrines it contained; and adapted to exemplify their truth and certainty. For we are by no means to esteem miracles, though I fear we are too apt to esteem them, as mere arbitrary, random acts, resulting from the divine will and pleafure; but as necessary, determinate, and rational acts, directed by the counsel of wifdom, and accommodated to the nature of those several points, which they were defigned to confirm and support.

Now this being the case; if any person should ever appear under the character of that prophet, that was to come into the world;

world; under the character, I mean, of the promised Messiah; as the end of his mission necessarily required, that he should, among other things, make a sulland perfect revelation God's will to mankind, and confirm that revelation by appropriate miracles; so the truth of his mission must of course depend on the certainty of his so doing. And therefore all claims to that title are best and soonest determined by a strict application to this simple rule.

Now, of all the persons, who assumed to themselves the character of the Messiah, Jesus of Nazareth is the only one, whose claim deserves our regard. This man, is it be lawful to call him a man, who was truly "the son of God," made a very extraordinary figure in the world. His birth was attended with many great, wonderful, and illustrious occurrences: suitable to the dignity of the descent he claimed; and fitted to awaken the attention of the world to what he should in time perform. a proper season he entered on his ministry with the public and fignal approbation of heaven *: and, in the course of it, opened to the world a new and aftonishing scene of "He went: about teaching in the fynagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom;" the glad tidings of approaching falvation. "And," to confirm and illustrate these tidings, he repeatedly "healed all manner of fickness, and all manner of disease among the people "" In a word, he performed an infinite number of miracles; and, on the authority of those miracles, established a more perfect institution of Religion—even such as pretends to supply and fill up all the deficiencies of the preceding dispensations; and to administer every thing, in abundant measure, that is necessary to the improvement, the perfection, and the happiness of man.

Matth. ii. 21 A Luke ii. 9-14.

128 SERMON XVII.

^{*} Matth. iii. 16, 17. Mar. i. 16, 11. Luke iii. 22.

⁶ Matth. iv. 23.—ix. 35.

These are such weighty, and interesting pretensions, as render the Gospel highly worthy of our most serious regard, and attentive consideration. And since it appears to be so much our concern, we shall therefore make it our suture business, to inspect and examine its contents; in order to see how far it really answers all these great and mighty pretensions, to which it is continually making claim. Though the subject is wide, yet the whole of our inquiry may completely be reduced to these two heads.

do in fact affert, that Jesus Christ has supplied the world with all those means, which we have now specified to be necessary to falvation?"

And, if fo,

2. "Whether the miracles therein recorded do sufficiently prove the truth of these doctrines; and evince to the world, that their author is able effectually to save and to bless those, who place their trust and confidence in him?"

Vol. II.

If these points appear upon examination to be well grounded, and firmly supported; then will there remain not the least doubt, that Jesus Christ is the predicted Messiah; the great " prophet that should come into the world:" and that his Gospel is that last and perfect dispensation, which was defigned for the recovery of all mankind: and which, in consequence of that design, "thoroughly furnishes" them with all the means, and powerfully encourages them by all reasonable motives, to live soberly, righteously and godly in this present life c;" that they may be fitted and difposed for the full enjoyment of that confummate happiness; which is reserved for the faithful in the life to come.

Now, to Him, who, as at this time, condescended to take our nature upon him; and who, in that nature, willingly performed for us every thing that was needful to redeem us from iniquity; and c Tit, ii. 12,

make

131 make us fit to be partakers of eternal glory: To Him, who fo loved us, and gave himself for us, be ascribed, as is most due, all grateful praise, adoration, and honour, from henceforth and for evermore. Amen.

SER-

MATTH. IX. 2.

And behold they brought to him a man fick of the palfy, lying on a bed: and Jesus seeing their faith, said unto the sick of the palfy, Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee.

HEN Jesus Christ appeared in the world, he declared, in conformity to the character he had assumed, that the grand design and purpose of his coming was "to redeem and save sinners";" "that 4 Matth. xviii. 11. Luke ix. 56.

K 3

wholo-

whosoever believed in him might not finally perish, but have or enjoy everlasting life."

Now the first thing, as we have already observed, necessary to the comfort and salvation of sinners, was an assurance of pardon for their past offences: an assurance that God would accept their repentance; and be reconciled to them on the reformation of their lives. Suitably therefore to this necessity, the Gospel informs us, that John the Baptist was sent before "to prepare the way of the Lord; and to give knowledge of salvation unto his people, by the remission of their sinss." And we are moreover informed, that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them s."

In pursuance of this plan, and as a proof of its divinity, when Christ entered on "the ministry of reconciliation," he not only published a general declaration of pardon upon e John iii. 16.

f Luke i. 77.

^{5 2} Cor. v. 19,

the condition of repentance and amendment of lifeh; but he also forgave some faithful penitents their sins in form; as an earnest or pledge of what he promifed to do for 'all others, who were equally qualified. And that the promise was general is evident from his own words. For, at the close of his refidence here on earth, he expresly told his disciples, "that" this doctrine of "repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name," not only among the Jews, but even "among ALL nations ":" of which, indeed, he had given them frequent intimations before; by extending his regard to "ftrangers and foreigners;" and making them objects of his mercy and beneficence; even at the time, when his ministry was confined " to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." And therefore, as those disciples, who were more immediately concerned with the Tews, had it in commission h Mark i. 14, 15. Luke xxiv. 47. Acts xiii. 38.

i Matth. ix. 2. John v. 14.

k Luke xxiv. 47.

¹ Matth. xv. 21-28. Mar. vii. 26-30. Luke vi. 17, 18.

to teach them, that "Christ was exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Ifrael, and forgiveness of sins m; and that their fins were," on this condition. accordingly " forgiven them for his name's fake":" fo likewise St. Paul, that great and celebrated Apostle of the Gentiles, had the very same thing in charge. For thus his commission runs. "I will send thee," saith the Lord, far hence unto the Gentiles "; to open their eyes, to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God;" that is, to bring them to repentance, 44 that they may receive forgiveness of sins; and," if they fulfil their duty, " an inheritance among them, who are fanctified by faith P." Agreeably to the tenour of this commission, "they all went forth, and preached every where:" exhorting the people " to repent and reform, that their fins might

[■] Acts v. 31.

[&]quot; Ephes. iv. 32.

[·] Acts xxii. 21.

P Acts xxvi. 18.

be blotted out; and that" they might happily enjoy that "divine refreshment," which inseparably attends the comfortable assurance of pardon and forgiveness.

Hence then it appears, that the first article we have specified, as necessary to the comfort and salvation of the world, is amply supplied and extended to the world by this general doctrine of grace and remission.

But here it may be urged, "that though the doctrine is full and pertinent, adequate to the wants, and suitable to the wishes, of all mankind; yet, how does it appear, that mankind could reasonably confide in it; could safely depend upon it? Had they any evidence offered them, that Jesus was possessed of the power he claimed; any security given them, that the sins he undertook to forgive were indeed forgiven?"

Evidence, you will find, and security in abundance: sufficient to remove every doubt, and to establish peace in the most anxious mind. For what is it to forgive sins? Is it not to deliver from those ill effects which sin produces, or to which it renders the finner obnoxious? But the primary effects and consequences of sin were diseases and death. And then, what can be conceived a stronger proof, a plainer evidence, of the real and actual forgiveness of sins; than to behold sinners relieved of their diseases, and delivered from the jaws of death, at the instant they were pronounced so forgiven? Now, this proof Jesus gave them. For "he healed all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease among the people s."

And this proof, it should be remarked, must appear to the Jews peculiarly plain and appropriate. For healing and forgiving are not only connected frequently in their writings; but even stand in their language as synonymous terms. Thus the Psalmist, enumerating the manifold mercies of God, celebrates him in the same breath as "forgiving his sins, and healing his infirmities"." The prophet Isaiah, describing the perverseness and obstinacy of the Jews, complains, that "they had made their heart gross, and their ears heavy, and had closed their eyes; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should return, and be bealed;" which Jonathan in his Targum on the place translates, " and be forgiven." This text is quoted by St. Matthew: and according to him, ends, like the prophet's, with "I should heal them "." But St. Mark, attending to the thing implied, alters the phrase, and, conformably to the paraphrast, reads at the close, and their fins should be forgiven them "." So that the connection, you fee, between the cures performed and the doctrine promulged, was in a manner forced and obtruded on their observation by the very genius and idiom of their language;

⁹ Matth. iv. 23.

Plal. ciii. 3.

[•] Ch. vi. 10.

t Ch. xii. 15.

[&]quot; Ch. iv. 12. This phraseology enters also into the Epistles, and deserves to be well attended to. Thus the persons, whom St. Paul, Rom. v. 6. calls ἀσθιτῶτ, are called in the 8th verse ἀμασθωλῶτ. Other instances are frequent.

by the modes of expression current among them.

But this evidence may be placed in another light: and in that light, perhaps, it may to us appear stronger.

Certain diseases were looked upon by all nations, and more especially by the Jews, as punishments inflicted for certain sins. This notion was inspired by the law, and strongly impressed on their apprehensions. It seems to have been always uppermost in their minds. For hence it was, that the disciples were so ready, when "they saw the man who had been blind from his birth," to ask our Saviour that question—"Who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind y?" And hence also it was, that our Saviour himself thought it necessary to caution some, whom he had cured of their ails, "to take care of their conduct, and sin no more; lest a worse thing should happen unto them z."

The Persians expelled every one that was afflicted with the leprofy out of their cities, believing such to have drawn this punishment upon themselves, by committing some offence against the Sun. Hardoot. Clio cap. cxxxviii. And the Egyptians esteemed the blindness which befel their king, Pheron, as a judgment upon him for his impiety against their great god, the river Nile. Hardoot. Euterp. cap. xi. Diodor. Sicul. Biblioth. lib. i. cap. v.

The diseases chiefly denounced by the law against all wilful and presumptuous offenders, are the leprosy, palsy, madness, and blindness. And these, it is observable, are among the chief of those diseases, which our Saviour miraculously cured. Now, if the accession or infliction of these diseases was a sure token, as it plainly was, of God's displeasure against such offenders; was not the sudden removal, or miraculous cure of John ix. 1, 2.

[📑] John v. 14.

⁴ Deut. xxviii. 15, &cc.

Lepers cleansed, Matth. viii. 2, 3. Luke xvii. 12—19. Paralyties cured, Matth. viii. 6.—ix. 2, &c. Lunatics or mad cured, Matth. iv. 24.—xvii. 15, &c. Blind restored to fight, Matth. ix. 27—30. xx. 30—34. John ix. 1—7.

them, as evident a token of his forgiveness? Suppose you were to see an imprisoned male-factor eased of his chains, and set at liberty before your eyes; could you possibly doubt of his having procured or received the king's pardon? But, what the release of this prisoner would be to us, the same were the cures, which Jesus wrought on those sinners, to the Jews: visible instances of the remission of their punishments; and therefore the properest and most convincing proofs of the remission of their sins.

But still it may be urged, "that notwith-standing these sanative miracles were thus properly adapted in their constitution, yet, how does it follow, that they were destined in their intention, to prove this doctrine of the forgiveness of sins? For they are seldom, if ever, applied by Christ to this purpose."

We grant indeed, and would have it obferved to the credit of the Gospel, that Christ was very sparing in making such precise and formal applications. He judged it sufficient, fufficient, in general, barely to exhibit the miracles; without either explaining their force, or pointing out their intention. former he left to be determined by the judgment of those who saw them: and the latter to be inferred from the occasions on which they were wrought. In short, he suffered the miracles to speak for him in their own language. And to the candid and ingenuous they spoke plain enough. For such no fooner beheld the works, than they perceived their connection and affinity with the doctrines; and acknowledged themselves convinced. But where vices and prejudices distorted the judgment; and led men to cavil, and raise objections; there he proceeded, in vindication of himself, and for the fake of the truth, after another manner. He argued the case; confuted their cavils; And applied the miracles to the points intended.

Of this we have a remarkable instance with respect to the article now before us. When the paralytic was brought to Christ at Capernaum, he faid to the man, "Thy fins are fergiven thee." This declaration the scribes and pharifees censured as blasphemous; as a bold invasion of the prerogative of God: for "who can forgive fins but God only?" In answer to this objection, and to make it apparent that he arrogated to himself no higher power than what he really possessed, he refers them at once to the miracle; and pertinently asks them-"Whether is easier? to say, Thy sins are forgiven thee; or to fay, Arife, and walk. But that ye may know, that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive fins, Arise, (faith he to the fick of the palfy) take up thy bed, and go unto thine house. And he arose, and departed to his house." Here, the miracle is by our Saviour himself expresly applied to the doctrine: applied to prove, that he was divinely empowered forgive fins. And indeed it proved it in fo distinct, and so clear a manner, that the unprejudiced multitude were instantly convinced; and with joyful gratitude "glorified God,

God, who had given Him fuch power's for the benefit and confolation of men.

But this power of forgiveness which God gave to Christ, Christ also gave to his disciples; and then declared, that "whose soever sins they should remit, were accordingly remitted to them"." And when "he sent them out to preach" this doctrine, he conferred upon them, as the Evangelist observes, the farther "power of healing sicknesses," by way of proof and confirmation of it. And we find them in consequence "travelling through the towns, preaching the Gospel, and healing every where "."

But as they conceived, while their mafter refided here on earth, that the powers they possessed were derived from him, and therefore had recourse to him only; so, when they judged it necessary, after his departure, c Matth. ix. 8. Δύδα ίξεσίαν τοιαύτην τοις ανθρώποις. fortasse τῷ ανθρώπος, " to the man:" i. e. Christ Jesus—otherwise it must be construed, as above, " for the benefit, &cc. of men." See Eph. iv. 8.

d John xx. 23.

Mark iii. 15.

f Luke ix. 6.

to apply to God for the continuance of them, it is very remarkable, that the fole power, which they particularly requested, was the power of curing difeafes. And they feem to have prayed, "that God would ftretch forth his hand," and enable them " to heal "," not only as it was an instance, expressive of the vital and saving efficacy of the Gospel in general; but more especially fo of the truth and certainty of this primary doctrine of it—the pardon and forgiveness of fins. And it is farther to be observed, that the first miracle of healing they wrought, was attended with fuch circumstances, as plainly shewed, that the efficacy of Christ's name, and consequently the forgiveness to be obtained through it, extended backwards and forwards; to times past as well as future. For fince "the man had been lame from his mother's womb, and was now above forty years old, when this miracle of healing was performed upon him ";" it is evident, that the virtue of Christ's name, though displayed after he left the world, yet reached to the cure of those maladies, which had their existence, before he ever came into it. And fince the Jews were taught, that " there was none other name under heaven, whereby they could be cured," and, of course, forgiven, but only the name of Jesus Christ: how highly must it concern them, to attend to the proofs, which the Apostles gave of his being the Messiah! How truly did it behove them, to cultivate those candid and ingenuous notions, that would lead them to believe on him; and to practife that repentance and holiness of life, which were the indispensable condition of their receiving pardon!

^{*} Acts iv. 29, 30.

h Acts iii. 2, 22/

For it remains still to be considered, that the doctrine of forgiveness was not promiscuously and indiscriminately proposed to persons of all characters: but was prudently guarded, and strictly limited to certain dispositions and qualifications;—to such dispositions and qualifications as rendered it consistent with the interest of virtue, and the advancement of that holiness, which it was the chief design of the Gospel to promote. Without this restriction, it would have been liable to be abused to the most pernicious Men of perverse minds would purpoles. have "turned the grace of our God into lasciviousness; and because mercy abounded, would have made their fins to abound the more "." To cut off therefore the occasion of finning from those who would have been ready to lay hold on fuch an occasion; nay, to convince them of the absolute necessity of repentance, and a fincere reformation of life and manners; Christ exprestly required Faith, as an indispensable qualification for obtaining either a cure of their ails, or the pardon of their iniquities.

Now Faith is a very complex term; and comprehends under it many excellent graces, noble endowments, and amiable dispositions. According to its original and primary acceptation in the Jewish theology, it may be said to denote in general, "that candid and k Rem. v. 20.

Jude. 4.

ingenuous temper of mind, which is difpoied to receive and to digest the great and important truths of religion for the benefit and improvement of the foul!" Hence then it implies a fincere love of truth; an anxious diligence in the pursuit of it; and a steady resolution of acting always conformably to it. As referred to Christ, it manifestly implies the following particulars: a ferious attention to his doctrines—an impartial examination of the truth of those doctrines; and of the proofs he gave of his divine mission—a hearty belief, grounded on those proofs, of his being the true and promised Messiah: -in consequence of this belief, a proper and worthy opinion of him; an humble trust and reliance upon him; an entire refignation to his will; and dutiful obedience to all his commands.

From this analysis of faith; this particular enumeration of the several good qualities concentred in it; it is easy to see with what security, as well as lenity, the forgiveness of sins might be annexed to it. where fuch a faith, as we have now explained, worked at the root, it could not fail of answering effectually the end of the Gospel; of producing in time "the plentiful fruits of good living." This then was, of all qualifications, the most strictly infifted upon; and indeed the most deservedly: because it was that which gave life and vigour to all Christian virtues. Now, its value and efficacy being fo momentous; fo fignally conducive to the advancement of piety; it is no wonder that we find it so frequently and highly celebrated in Scripture; and honoured with fuch mighty privileges:-No wonder, that " it was counted unto men for righteousness;" that it entitled them to the pardon of their past sins; and recommended them to the future favour of God.

1 HEYLIN's Lectures, vol. i.

To impress the world with a due sense of the meritorious efficacy of such a Belief; and consequently to engage men in the cultivation of it; Christ frequently declared to those, who made their humble applications to him, "that it was their faith that faved them, "or made them whole:" in other words, that it was their fincere and candid disposition; their open acknowledgement of him, as the Messiah; their devout confidence in his goodness; and their firm resolution of obeying his laws; that rendered them objects of his mercy—that fitted them for the cure they then received; and moreover entitled them to that higher bleffing, the pardon or release from fin, of which the cure was a proof and emblem. A declaration, as difcouraging to vice, as it was favourable to virtue. For while it administered to the penitent and well-disposed all imaginable comfort: it excluded the wicked, the obstinate, and unbeliving from all hopes of benefit or advantage. And therefore a declaration that should excite them to correct and reform their tempers; to cultivate good and worthy dispositions; and to advance in the love and practice of virtue; in order to be qualified for the participation of those blesfings, that were graciously tendered to them.

L, 4

For

For where there was no faith; that is, where the forementioned qualifications were wanting; there Christ could perform no cures. . Though "the power of the Lord was present to heal m," yet such faithless persons were not adapted to receive its virtue. Thus it is particularly recorded by St. Matthew, that, "when our Saviour came to his own city Nazareth," and found the inhabitants obstinate and malicious, " he wrought not," or rather, " could not work many miracles there, because of their unbelief "." make it, however, the more clearly appear. that the defect was entirely their own; St. Mark observes, that "he laid his hands on a few fick folks," whose sufferings had probably rendered them better disposed than others, " and they all recovered "."

On such terms did our Lord, in the days of his sleth, extend his mercy to those in Palestine, who resorted to him for relief m Luke v. 17.

[.] n Ch. xiii. 58.

⁶ Ch. vi. 5.

On fuch terms did he heal their diseases, and pardon their fins. Now we have also our fins and maladies; which can only be cured, can only be forgiven, on the fame conditions. If we mean that our fins should be blotted out, and our spiritual infirmities strengthened; we must apply to Christ with a deep and penitent fense of our guilt; and with a fincere desire of being delivered from it. We must approach him with an humble confidence, that he will, according to his promife, make up what is wanting in our nature by the fuccours of his heavenly grace. And if we approach him with these proper dispositions, we may rest assured, that "his grace will be sufficient for us:" sufficient to deliver us from our past offences; and to strengthen our weakness for future and better services. For he is no less powerful, now he is in heaven; than he formerly was, when he lived on earth. "The fulness of the Godhead dwells in him" for our use. And in the power of the divinity "he is always" and every where "prefent" with us; ready to communicate all the affiftance, that our necessities can want or require. Though he does not now, as in time past, "travel about" in a visible form "through all the cities and villages, healing those that have need of healing;" yet nevertheless, he has established the true religion and its ordinances in every city and village; and if the inhabitants of these cities and villages would duly atttend the worship of God, and join with pious and devout affections in the established ordinances of religion; they would experience, to their comfort, such divine influence to be derived therefrom. as would effectually cure all the maladies and disorders of their souls; and raise their powers to the measure of their duty. But then they should be careful to employ these powers in the discharge of their duties-in "adding to their faith the virtues" of an useful and holy conversation. For then only when we begin to "have our fruit

Matth. ix. 35. Mark vi. 6. Luke xiii, 22.

SERMON XVIII. 155 unto holiness," can we hope that "the end will be everlasting lifes."

Now to God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, be ascribed, as is most due, all honour and glory, &c. Amen.

9 Rom. vi. 22.

S E R M O N XIX.

Rом. xii. 2.

-That ye may prove, what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God.

IT has been already shewn, in a former Discourse, how amply and effectually the first thing, requisite to the salvation of sinners, was provided for in the Gospel of Christ: that is, how fully and clearly the doctrine of forgiveness was, according to the necessity of their case, promulged and confirmed to the whole world.

But

158 SERMON XIX.

But this doctrine of the forgiveness of past sins, however clearly proved, could afford mankind but little comfort unless they practised for the future what was lawful and right." But alas! they were not able, in many and important instances, to discover what the right was. The institutions of the Gentiles, being loose and erroneous, perpetually led them to act amiss. And the law of the Jews, though meant and adapted to promote the practice of virtue and goodness; was yet so vilely and abominably corrupted by the false glosses of the Scribes and Pharisees, that it often became an instrument of sin.

Hence then it is evident, that both the one and the other, Jews as well as Géntiles, stood in need of some farther instructions for the better regulation of their moral conduct: that they stood in need of such a perfect and complete rule of life, as would faithfully direct them, in all occurrences, what to do, and what to avoid, in order to secure the savour of God, and render them-selves acceptable to him.

Now such a rule the Gospel supplies; not only as it "teaches men in general, that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, "they should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world":" but also as it lays down particular precepts for the discharge of those several duties, to which we are bound in our several relations; and consequently exhibits a clear and comprehensive system of morals, sounded on the highest authority, and ensorced by the most weighty fanctions.

Now, the whole system of morality is usually, and not improperly, divided into three capital branches; respecting the various duties, which we owe to God, to our fellow-creatures, and to ourselves:—and which are distinctly represented in the sacred writings.

Of these duties the first, as well in order as dignity, are those which we owe to God. But, as all the duties we owe to God derive their origin from his nature and attributes, and from the various relations which he stands in to us; so the Scripture represents those attributes and relations in the truest, sublimest, and most affecting manner; and sets forth the Deity in an amiable and glorious light.

160 SERMON XIX.

His nature is no longer debased by such mean and gross ideas, as the ignorant heathens entertained of him: but is exalted to a proper dignity, and described in becoming characters. We no longer view him under the ignoble images of corruptible things; but know him now according to his divine and spiritual nature: know him to be the one felf-existent, and absolutely perfect Being; incorporeal, invisible, eternal: the Being, who at first created, and still governs, the world; and who, though " he hath his dwelling so high in heaven, vet humbleth himself to behold the things. that are done on earth:" and beholdsthem not as an idle, indifferent spectator; but, as an all-powerful agent, orders and disposes them according to the measure of his righteous will, and the dictates of confummate wifdom.

• Píal. cxiii. 5, 6.

In the government and disposal of things, he is represented as acting for the general benefit of all his creatures. Nothing is beneath his notice: his providence, care, and mercy extend over all his works. But he is more especially attentive to the concerns of the human race. He looks upon them as his children; and, with a kind of paternal tenderness, pities their infirmities; relieves their distresses; and, on their sincere repentance, pardons their fins. As the great father of all, he is equally gracious to all. "He is the God, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles. For with him there is no respect of persons; but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him '." But then righteousness must be carefully practifed. For though God is infinitely gracious, yet is he likewise infinitely just and holy; " of purer eyes than to behold iniquity;" and of higher refentment against it, than to suffer it to go unpunished. And that he may reward or punish according to equity, the Scripture describes him, as constantly inspecting our behaviour and conduct; and fearching into the inmost recesses of our souls. And in consequence of this inspection, it sarther assures us, that "he will judge the world hereaster in righteousness; and render to every man according to his deeds";" not only according to his outward actions, but according to the inward dispositions of his heart.

^{*} Rom. iii. 29.

² Ibid. ii. 11. Ads x. 34, 35.

Such is the general idea, which the Scripture gives us of God. An idea that is not only august and awful; but also lovely, engaging and delightful: not only suitable to the majesty of the Supreme; but also productive of the most worthy affections, and most grateful resentments towards him—the furest and most powerful incentives to the faithful discharge of those duties we owe him:

^{*} Pf. ix. 8, Rom. ii, 6,

For when we consider the excellency of his nature and attributes; how great and good he is in himself, and how kind and beneficent to us; we find ourselves strongly; though fweetly, moved to love, adore, and revere him. And the more we contemplate his wonderful perfections, the more convinced we become, that it is our duty to love him in the degree we are commanded; that is, " with all our hearts, with all our fouls, and with all our minds *." indeed, it is much to be wished that it our hearts were daily enlarged." For "this is the first and great commandment;" thatwhich supports, and which insures obedience to all the rest. Where the love of God prefides in the heart, there must be a defire and determination to please him; to regard him in every action; and to "do all to the glory" of his name: " there must be a determination to avoid every thing that may grieve or offend him; to refign every interest, and to suppress every inclination, that may interfere with our obligations to him. Perfwaded of his infinite wisdom and power, and of his goodness in applying them to the welfare of his creatures, we shall exercise, as we are injoined, a firm trust and considence in him²; commit ourselves wholly to his divine disposal; and acquiese, with thankfulness, in the allotments of his providence: solicitous only, that our conduct in every state may be always such as becometh those, who are finally to give an account.

^{*} Matth. xxii. 37. Mark'xii. 30.

^{. 7} i Core xe 3fe ..

164 SERMON XIX.

But farther; when we consider God as our creator and preserver, "the author and giver of all good things;" from whom we have received all we enjoy; and to whom we look for all we want; conscious of our absolute dependance upon him, we are naturally led, as we are justly required, to make our requests and acknowledgements to him, in the solemn acts of worship and devotion. But how mean, impersect, and unworthy were these acts of devotion, as performed in ancient times! And how much are we indebted to the instructions of the Gospel for the noble refinement they have fince undergone? For as we are there taught that "God is a spirit;" so, suitably to the nature of fuch a Being, we are commanded to "worship him in spirit and in truth ":" to worship him, not merely with external rites, and bodily fervice; but with inwardly pure and holy affections—with fincerity of heart, and the devout application of our mental powers. This is the only acceptable fervice; nor will this fervice be accepted but in the name, and through the mediation, of Jesus Christ. A mode of worship highly conducive to the great purposes of genuine piety; not only as it tends to preserve in our minds a due sense of our unworthiness as finners, and of the perfect holiness of that God against whom we sin; but also as it ferves to dispel our dark and guilty fears, and to inspire us with an ingenuous trust and affiance—fure, if we strive to obey him from the heart, of finding in the end acceptance with him, through the merits and interceftfion of "his beloved fon, in whom he is well pleafed"."

² Phil. iv. 6. 1 Tim. vic 17. 1 Pet. v. 7.

^{*} Matth. vi. 6-13. vii. 7---11. Phil. iv. 6.

• John iv. 24.

Pass we now to the duties we owe to our fellow-creatures: "which are all comprehended in this faying; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." which, observed, must be of truly great and fignal use in abating the miseries that distressed the world; when men of all perfuafions "lived in continual malice and envy; hateful, and hating one anothere." And as so much depended, and still depends, on the due observance of this precept, our Saviour has been careful to ascertain its meaning; and to guard it from those false and confined interpretations, which the perverseness of men might put upon it. He has often inculcated, that our benevolence should extend to ail; and that, whenever we are bleffed with an opportunity of ferving the interests of mankind, we should always

Matt. iii 17. xvii. 5.

d Rom xiii. q.

Tit. iii. 3.

embrace it with chearfulness and alacrity; accounting every person "our neighbour," who flands within our reach and influence. In consequence of this principle, we are enjoined, as it is meet; " to act by others in every circumstance, as we would have others to act by us 't" that is, we are enjoined to make our own reasonable wishes and expectations the rules of our conduct towards other men. And if we proceed by these rules, we shall never wrong or injure any man; but shall " render to all their dues ";" and to the utmost of our power promote. both their spiritual and temporal welfare. We shall never be rash in our judgment of others; but rather disposed to put a favourable construction on all their actions. We shall be ready, as we are required, to assist them in their necessities, and to sympathize with them in their afflictions: as well as to rejoice in the good that befals them b-espe-

f Matth, vii. 12.

Rom. xiii. 7.

^{*} Rom. xii. 13-15.

cially when it concerns the prosperity of their souls.

168

Now, as we are directed to these things by the Gospel-rules, so are we carried to the performance of them by the natural impulse of those benevolent affections, which God has implanted in our constitution. But in the intercourse of life these affections are liable to be obstructed. The violence of enemies, and the infolence of oppressors, are apt to suspend their course, if not to excite different resentments. And therefore our Saviour has been particularly folicitous to open them a passage through these obstructions, and to teach them, notwithstanding, to flow on the world. To this end, he shewed his disciples, not only the mischief of retaliating injuries; but the baseness of acting so far beneath their character. ye love them that love you, what thanks have ye? for finners also love those who love them: And if ye do good to them only who do good to you, what thanks have ye? for finners also do even the same '.'' When he had thus represented the incongruity of acting on fuch low principles, he then exhorts them to cultivate and exert the most liberal fentiments; to aspire after the highest perfection; and make their own benevolence to resemble that of God himself. "But love ye your enemies: bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you; and pray for them, who despitefully use you, and perfecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father, who is in heaven: for he maketh his fun to rife on the evil and on the good; and fendeth rain on the just and on the unjust k." And to shew how absolutely necessary it is, that we should be truly possessed of this forgiving temper; of the disposition to return good for evil; he has not only required us to infert it in our prayers, that "God would forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive others" the offences committed against ourselves; but has also forewarned us in express terms, that " if we forgive not men their trespasses, neither will our heavenly Father forgive us!."

^{*} Manh. v. 44, 45.

But besides the duties of general benevolence, which we equally owe to all; there are others again, of a more contracted nature, arifing from certain relations in life, which are highly conducive to the enjoyments of it, and therefore deserve our particular regard. Such are the duties of magiftrates and subjects, husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants. and the like. And for the discharge of these duties the Scripture affords us very excellent precepts, and most accurate directions: fuch precepts and directions, as, duly attended to cannot fail of preserving the order and welfare of fociety; and of making nations, families, and individuals happy.

But to render this happiness complete, we are bound moreover to observe and practise the various duties, that relate to ourselves. Now, in order to lay a proper foundation for this branch of our conduct, the Scripture enfoins us to regulate and improve our tempers; to govern all our affections and appetites; "and to bring every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christm." consequence of this, we are directed "to live foberly ":" that is, to cultivate and practife that univerfal fobriety, which regards the whole of our composition. are to acquire that meekness, modesty, and humility, which are the sobriety of the mind; and that temperance, chastity, and purity, which are the fobriety of the body: and which ferve, when united, to support the fovereignty of reason and conscience; and to maintain the dignity of human nature.

¹ Matth. vi. 15. xviii. 35.

These virtues and graces are frequently and earnestly recommended to us, as essential ingredients of the christian character. And indeed with great propriety. For what can be more becoming such impersect and sinful creatures as we are, than a modest, meek, and humble deportment? And what,

m 2 Cor. x. 5.

[!] Tit. ii. 2, 4, 6, 12.

in general, can contribute more, than these are known to do, to the undisturbed enjoyments, and real advantages, of life? In this sense it is true, that "blessed are the meek; for they shall inherit the earth"." And it is no less true, that "he who humbleth himself" is in the ready way to "be exalted?:" if not to the dignities and emoluments of the world; yet to an high degree of esteem and respect among the wise and the worthy.

And then again, as to the virtues of purity and temperance, how fit and congruous is it, that the worshippers of a pure and holy God should be careful and constant in the exercise of them! nay indeed, how necessary is it, that they should keep themselves from all the pollutions both of sless and spirit; since we are well assured; that, "without holiness" and purity of heart, "no man shall see the Lord."

[•] Matth. v. 5.

Matth. xxiii. 12.

⁴ Heb.xii. 14.

Hence therefore, the Scripture represents it, as the chief and continual business of a Christian, to watch the various emotions of concupifence; and to preserve a close and strict guard over all his passions: to maintain, by all means, that self-government and discipline, which is necessary to suppress the irregularities of his desires; and to form daily such virtuous resolutions, as may dispose him to "abstain from those slesshy lusts, which was against," and tend to destroy, "the soul"."

Now these are the great lines of that moral system, which is delivered in the New Testament. And from these main lines it evidently appears, that the author of it entered into the true spirit of morality; and proceeded in the justest form. He laid the foundation of it at the heart; and erected the superstructure according to conscience. And whoever is so wise as to observe his directions, will gradually attain to the utmost persection, that human nature is capable

For here, " whatfoever things are true, whatfoever things are honest, whatfoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure. whatsoever things are lovely, virtuous, and of good report :-- " these are all not only pointed to our view, but strongly recommended to our practice: and recommended not merely, according to the mode of the ancient philosophers, from the considerations of prudence, profit, pleafure, decency, or reputation; but prefied upon us as the will and command of that God, who is the fovereign Lord of the universe; who knoweth our most secret thoughts; and who will bring us to answer, not only for the things we do, but for the principles from which we do them.

Precepts and instructions of this stamp, so worthy of "a teacher come from God," so conformable to the dictates of right reason, and so conducive to the reformation and improvement of the world, carry with them their own evidence. They stand in need of no foreign proofs, of no signs or miracles to fupport them. They manifest at once their own truth and excellence; and approve themselves to every man's conscience, as of persectly pure and divine original.

Philip. iv. 8.

And accordingly, it is observable, that our Saviour performed no mighty works, no particular miracles, to confirm either the fitness or the binding force of his moral, practical precepts; but left them to stand on their own bottom, and to justify themselves to the common sense of mankind; well assured, from their exact conformity to the suggestions of conscience, that they must needs gain the approbation of the world; especially when exemplified in life and practice.

This was the only evidence, this the only recommendation they wanted. And Though our Saviour performed no particular miracles to phove the fitness of his moral precepts; yet the miracles, which he performed on other accounts, contributed to give them weight and authority. For as they shewed he was a teacher that deferved to be attended to; so they roused and excited his hearers to pay a proper and becoming regard to what he taught and preached—and were so far of use to enforce all his moral lessons and practical instructions.

this evidence, this recommendation, our Saviour displayed and urged on their behalf, in the most perfect and affecting manner. What he taught, he practifed. He not only shewed us the way, wherein we should walk; but walked himself before us in it. He suffered us not to be guided merely by the dead letter; but enlivened his precepts by correspondent actions: " leaving us an example, that we might follow his steps". In him we may behold a most complete pattern of the conduct that is required of us. For his life, as it is set before us, was one continued course. of the most substantial, and most excellent virtues. A life of fingular piety, benevólence, purity, patience, meekness, and refignation; and of every thing good and praise-worthy: and consequently a life, that necessarily must, and actually did, by its amiableness and excellency, engage the unprejudiced and well-disposed to form their behaviour according to it. For it is sufficiently known, how foon, and how readily, the primitive disciples " renounced," under the influence of their master's example, all "the hidden things of dishonesty; and with what simplicity and godly sincerity they planned and conducted their whole conversation, amidst a crooked and perverse generation, among whom they shone as lights in the world."

And hence we are furnished with a full and determinate answer to a question, that has often been proposed to the disparagement of the Christian scheme. The question I mean is this: "Why was the institution of our holy religion laid down in the way of history; and not rather in some more methodical or systematic form?" And the answer to it is, that the form, in which our religion now appears, is attended with some great and peculiar advantages, which could not be obtained in any other way?. Mere ^{* 2} Cot. iv. 2 .-- i. 12. Phile ii. 15.

⁷ See Bp. Law's Theory of Relig. part ii. p. 108, ed. 5th.

JEFFERY'S Commencement Serm. among his Discourses, vol. 11.

P. 431.

dogmatical institutes are dry and unaffecting. Subtile discourses on the nature, tendencies, and effects of virtue, are too refined for common understandings. And a methodical fystem of divinity would afford us, at best, but an ideal, unanimated knowledge of duty. Whereas, on the contrary, in the history of our Saviour's life, we have the most perfect representation of true religion, accommodated to all capacities; and the most powerful inducements to obedience, adapted to work on all constitutions. Here we see it visibly demonifrated, that the things taught are not merely speculative, but rather practical, truths: were not intended only to amuse and entertain the mind; but to regulate and improve the manners. Here we also see, that the things required are not beyond the reach of our abilities. However weak we are in ourselves, "we may nevertheless accomplish all through Christ, who strengthens us z." The apostles and first disciples are witnesses to the world of what human nature is able to perform under the influence of the divine spirit. And since "they were men of like passions with ourselves;" and yet ran a course of such consummate virtue; their conduct is a call and encouragement to us; to become in our degrees "followers of them; as they were of Christ Jesus b."

^{*} Phil. iv. 13.

From what has been faid it is obvious to infer, of what infinite fervice fuch a pure and excellent fystem of morals must needs be to a corrupted world, over-run with the abominations of vice and idolatry. Where-ever it was adopted, and heartily embraced, it wrought a most wonderful and happy change. True piety, gentle dispositions, and purity of manners succeeded into the place of blind superstition, brutal passions, and inordinate lusts. Under the benign aspect of this noble institution, all kinds of virtue sprung up apace: all kinds of virtue ton-tinued to flourish; while men continued to attend, as they ought, to the sacred injunc-

^{*} Acts xiv. 15.

r Cor. xi. 1.

tions delivered to them. If Christians have abated of their former zeal: if their virtues are now fewer, and of a lower stile, than they were before; the misfortune is chiefly owing, to their having too little regard and respect to the life and conduct of our bleffed Master. Nor is there any method more likely to recover them to the practice of genuine piety and goodness; than to endeavour, if possible, to engage their studies to the laws of the Gospel; and to fix their meditations on the character of Christ. our studies, so directed, will improve us greatly in the knowledge of our duty; and our meditations, so employed, will naturally incite us to the faithful discharge of it. . "While we are mufing" on the charms of fo lovely a character as that of our Saviour, "the fire" of admiration "will kindle" in our breafts, and quicken our powers to attempt its resemblance.

Let us therefore be persuaded to "set the Lord always before us;" directing our course by the light, and taking courage from the influence, of his example; till, being first made like to him in holiness, we be finally made like to him in glory; and from treading in his steps below, be admitted to the honour of filling up his train above— "following the Lamb whither soever he goeth b:"

To whom, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be ascribed all honour, adoration, and praise, &c. Amen.

5 Rev. xiv. 4.

grand de la caractera de la ca ·...

James of the way of the first of the same of the

.

. •

•

Rom. vii. 22-25.

For I delight in the law of God after the inward man.

But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin, which is in my members.

O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord.

I N my last Discourse, I laid before you, according to the order of the method proposed, a brief summary of that system of N 4 morals, morals, which is delivered in the New Testament. A system that appears, even from such a general and impersect representation, to be highly reasonable, just, and good; worthy of a teacher come from God; and manifestly conducive to the improvement and persection of human nature: and consequently a system, which men must need heartily approve; must need embrace with warm complacency; as what they could rejoice to be conformed to in the completest manner, and in the highest degree,

But, whatever esteem they mentally entertained for, and whatever delight, as actuated merely by the principle of reason, they might take in, this revealed law; yet no sooner did they attempt to follow its directions, and act up to the measure of its obligations, but they "found another," and quite opposite "law in their members, warring against the law of their minds, and bringing them into captivity to that law of sin, which is seated in the slessly appetites."

c Rom. vii. 22, 23.

: Hence then it became necessary to their welfare and happiness, that "this body of fin," this ftrong prevalency of the fenfual appetites, should be abolished and destroyed; that men, "being delivered from the bondage of corruption," might be placed at liberty to profecute the works of truth and righteoulnels. In the profecution of these works, they would find themselves feeble and weak; whilst the temptations of the world preffed against them with force and vigour. And therefore, to make good their way, it became further necessary, that they should be supplied and endowed with fuch an addition of firength, as might enable them to withstand all opposing difficulties; and to fubdue every irregular passion to the Africa obedience of the divine commands. In a word, as the " law of God is spiritual, and men are carnal," prone and addicted to fire; it was absolutely necessary, that a now principle of life and holiness should be infused into their hearts—to correct their depravity, to fanctify their affections, and to invigorate their powers for nobler and more perfect perfect fervices: that, "being made free from fin, and become fervants to God, they might have at prefent their fruit unto holiness, and in the end attain to everlasting life"."

Now this grand requisite, the basis of all moral improvement, Jesus Christ, as the author of falvation, supplied in the most abundant: measure. For to those who believe in him he promifed the affistance of the Holy Spirit, to help their infirmities, and carry them forwards in the ways of godliness. By the grace and influence of this spirit "they are delivered from the slavery of fin and Satan into the glorious liberty, and illustrious privileges, of the sons of God They are quickned into a new life, and renovated in the temper and difposition of their mind. The decayed frame of their foul is not only repaired and reformed; but its powers are improved; and enlarged. The more readily they submit

⁴ Rom. vi. 22.

Rom. viii. 26. Ephef. iii. 16.

f Rom. viii. 21.

to the guidance of the spirit, the more perfect they become. They are thence endowed with higher faculties, with quicker apprehensions, with better judgments, with purer inclinations, and with nobler affections, than they were possessed of before: so that, in the language of Scripture, they are faid to be "new men," and "new creatures;" 66 born again, and formed according to the image of God in righteoulness and true holiness:" that is, "they are so strengthned with might by the Holy Spirit in the inner man h," as to be able to live in a stricter conformity to the divine commands; and to refemble their Maker in higher degrees, and more worthy respects, than they could have done in their natural state. In short, "they are, or may be, complete in him; being thoroughly furnished unto all good works i." " And therefore there is now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit.

^{5 2} Cor. v. 17. Ephes. iv. 24.

h Ephef. iii. 16.

¹ Col. ii. 10. 2 Tim. iii. 17.

For the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made them free from the law of sin and death k."

Such were the supplies, aids, and affiftances, which Christ promised and engaged to provide for the moral wants and infirmities of his disciples. And what he so promifed, he gave them full and undoubted proof he could likewife perform. For could they doubt, whether he, who delivered men continually from the possession of Satan, could also defend them against his assaults? Could they doubt, whether he, who miraculoufly supplied the necessities of nature. could impart the requisite succours of grace? Could they doubt, whether he, who cured the maladies, defects, and infirmities of the body, could also cure the wrong dispositions and difeases of the mind?

But these arguments, obvious as they are, may yet, perhaps, leave the point in some obscurity. Let us therefore bring it into a clearer light. And to this purpose be it here k Rom. viii. 1, 2.

premised, that all the wifer moralists, Gentiles as well as Jews 1, commonly described the human nature under a two-fold diffinction-that of the inward and the outward man; and spoke of the one as a type or representation of the other. Hence then the diseases of the body present themselves in another view; quite different from that in which they were seen before, considered as the consequences, and the chastisements of They appear now to be natural emblems of the several disorders and depravations of the foul. And therefore every miraculous cure of any particular distemper of the body became, of course, a significant emblem of the power of Christ to remove the correspondent depravation of the mind. Frequent intimations of this fort the attentive reader will find dispersed through various parts of the Gospel. Nor are there some instances wanting, where the application is made in direct and express terms.

Christ

in Aur. Carm. Pythag. Rom. vii. 22. 2 Cor. iv. 16.

Christ often declared, that he was come into the world to remove the ignorance, and to enlighten the understanding, of mankind ... To prove this, he restored fight to those who were blind. To make it appear, that he was able, as he affirmed, to remove the blindness, the spiritual blindness, of errour and ignorance; he frequently cured that corporeal blindness, which is the most natural emblem or image of it. And that fuch cures were peculiarly defigned, as they were exquifitely adapted, to confirm the truth of this doctrine; is evident from the reflection which our Saviour makes, previous to his cure of the blind man, recorded in the IXthof John. As long, fays he, as "I am in the world, I am the light of the world "." By this he turned their thoughts to himself, as to the fountain of light and knowledge; and led them to confider the miracle he was about to perform, as a direct evidence of what he had afferted. He restored, or ram John viii. 12. xii. 35, 36. 46.

n Ver. 5.

ther reformed of the man's eyes to the perception of light; and thereby shewed he could also restore, or reform the mind to the perception of knowledge. And it was plainly with the same view, when he observed how the malice and perverseness of the Jews with-held them from admitting this necessary consequence, that he afterwards subjoined, in allusion to the miraculous cure he had wrought, that "for judgment he was come into this world; that they who see not, might see; and that they who see, might be made blind?"

The Scripture informs us, that " the Son of God was for this purpose manifested, that he might utterly destroy the works of the devil⁹; and redeem us from the power of Satan to himself." Now to convince the world of his ability to accomplish this arduous undertaking, he frequently desired

As the person was born blind, and never had his eye-sight, our Saviour not only recovered, but made his eyes. Hence St. Cyprian, speaking of this care, says, Oculos formasset. De. Patient. § 4.

P John ix. 39.

⁴ I John iii. 8.

or cast out devils; and delivered the posfessed from their tormenting power. And. his casting them out in so wonderful a manner, was a proof by example of his being come to overturn the kingdom of darkness: and of his being endowed with authority to check and controul the usurped dominion of our grand enemy. This application is our Saviour's own. For when the feventy reioiced, that "the devils, through his name, were subject unto them; he answered and faid, "I beheld Satan, as lightning, fall from heaven, &c."—his power is broken; his dominion, destroyed: and the superiority, which you have now shewn in miraculously dispossessing dæmons, is a proof and a pledge of the spiritual conquest, which you, and all my faithful disciples, shall finally obtain over them and their prince "

So our Saviour directs us to conclude. But in these and other instances, the connection

¹ Matth. viii. 28. ix. 32, &c. xii. 22. xvii. 18. Mark i. 23, &c. iii. 21. v. 2—15. vii. 25; &c. xi. 17, &c. Luke iv. 33, &c. viii. 26, &c. ix. 38—42. xi. 14.

⁵ Luke x. 17, 18.

¹ Ibid. ver. 19.

nection between the miracles and doctrines: is so very natural, so close and discernible. that it could hardly have been overlooked. though Christ had never pointed it out. His having, however, pointed it out, is of fingular use and service. It serves to shew, that what infidels urge concerning the difparity of miracles and doctrines", is entirely false and frivolous. It serves to shew, that there is the same strict relation, the same inviolable connection, between the miracles and doctrines of Christ, as there is between experiments in natural philosophy and the conclusions that result from them. And hence it likewise serves to shew, after what manner we may fafely apply those other miracles, which are not applied by Christ himself. We may consider, for example, his restoring the lame, weak, and palsied members of the body, as a specimen of his power to restore the enseebled, benumbed, and distorted faculties of the mind. His cures of

Vol. II.

0

leprofies

[&]quot; This is Spinos A's boasted argument: but what little reason he had to boast of it, is, I trust, now apparent.

SERMÓN XX.

194

leprofies and all other loathfome diseases, we may consider as tokens of the power he possessed to cleanse the soul from the pollutions of sin. In sine, we may consider his making men, however diseased, all on a sudden vigorous and healthy; as an earnest of his making them, provided they followed his moral instructions, eminently good, virtuous, and happy.

But his ability in this respect was not only evidenced by these remoter analogous instances; it was moreover exemplified in the actual manifestation of the genuine promised effects. For his disciples, in consequence of their master's promise, were endowed with such "wisdom, as their adversaries could neither gainsay or resist." They were inspired with such a love of truth, as rendered them indesatigable in the propagation of it. They were totally altered in the temper of their minds; and transformed into new creatures. The power of the spirit was visible in the improvements which they made by his affistance. For they no longer lived the rest of their time in the evil customs and vicious practices of the world; but, ever attentive to that which was good, " walked in the commandments of the Lord, blameless y." Hence then they abounded in all the fruits of truth and righteousness, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, among whom they shone as bright and glorious lights 2." And though they laboured under peculiar difficulties, and were obliged to " wrestle not only against flesh and blood, but also against principalities and powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, and against spiritual wickedness in high places; yet in all these things they were more than conquerors, through him that strengthned them "."

And, as the promife was not folely made to them; but also, in consideration of the like necessity, "to their children after them; and to all that were afar off, even as many as the Lord our God should call ; fo the life and conversation of every sincere and pious Christian exhibits a clear and sensible demonstration, that Christ still abides with his church; and that he continues to impart such spiritual succours to all her members, as are suitable to their circumstances, and adequate to their wants.

J Luke i. 6.

^{*} Philip. ii. 15.

^{*} Ephes. vi. 12,

Having then such promises of super-natural grace, and such assurances given us for the accomplishment of them; how thankful ought we to be to God for this marvellous instance of his regard and kindness! He might justly have left us in that low, weak, and wretched condition, to which we had perversely reduced ourselves. But "when we were thus without strength;" oppressed by guilt, and quite unequal to the practice of holiness, "he mercifully saved us," cleansed us from our sins, strengthned our infirmities, and exalted our powers to the measure of our duty; "by the washing of regenera-b Acts ii. 39.

⁶ Rom. v. o.

tion, and renewing of the Holy Ghost."

If we are now sufficient for that which is good, "it is not of ourselves, as of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God." And therefore with what grateful praise should we celebrate his mercy, in that he condescends to dwell in our hearts by his spirit; and so to operate on our minds and wills, as to repair that image of his, in which he at first created us, by "creating us again in Christ Jesus unto good works;" and sitting us for the enjoyment of that eternal happiness for which he originally designed us.

But then it should be remembered, that this spirit of promise," however necessary to our improvement and happiness, will not be conferred but on certain conditions. For as it is well known, that, with regard to the diseases of the body, they only obtained a cure, and happily experienced the return of health, who applied themselves to Christ in a Tit. iii. 5.

² Cor. iii. 5. Ephel. ii. 10.

faith, and punctually observed his directions; fo it is no less manifest, that, with regard to the diseases of the soul, they only can hope to receive the falutary influences of the Holy Spirit, who are fervent in their prayers for the divine affistance; and diligent in the use of those appointed means, whereby God has engaged to dispense it. A consideration that · may justly alarm those, who neglect or despise the ordinances of religion. Their conscience tells them they are not so good as they ought to be; and yet, while they ' continue to neglect the proper means, it is impossible they should grow better. fuch neglects they do, as it were, break down the conduits of all heavenly influences; and stop the current of divine grace from flowing in upon their fouls.

But when we have used the appointed means, and are consequently blessed with the invaluable gift of the Holy Spirit; let us still be careful to comply with his secret, pious suggestions; and be ready to co-operate with his gracious motions. The advantage of having God's help, far from rendering it unnecessary unnecessary to help ourselves, obliges us to it in a peculiar manner. We are therefore to "work out our own falvation, because he worketh in us both to will and to do. of his good pleasure s." For it is a great aggravation of every fin, that, by running into the commission of it, we quench and stifle all the good and pious motions, excited by the spirit of God in our hearts. And it is a great incitement to our endeavours of performing every duty, that with fuch aids we may be fure of fuccess. For "greater is he that is in us, than he that is in the world h." And the almighty power of this divine affistant seems to be in Scripture so particularly fet before us, with a view to animate us in our Christian warfare. this end it is pobly adapted. For what farther encouragement can we need, to engage us in the vigorous profecution of our duty; than to be well affured, as we are affured, that, let z Philip ii. 12, 13.

b John iv. 4.

our difficulties be what they will, "we may be more than conquerors, through him that strengthens," guides, and supports "us'?"

If this, which was intended to inspire us with courage, should unhappily render us careless and presumptuous; then are we, on the other hand, frequently and forcibly admonished to consider, that, how powerful foever our affiftant is, yet we must not expect he should perform the whole that is incumbent upon us. We have our part to act; and, having prepared us for it, it is his only to help our endeavours. therefore it behaves us to take heed to ourselves, "that we receive not the grace of God in vain '-" to take heed to ourfelves, " that we work out our falvation with fear and trembling 1:" for if we fail, we fail at last by our own remissness.

i Phil. iv. 13.

^{* 2} Cor. vi. 4

¹ Phil. ii. 12,

Were we inclined to humour the vein of curiofity, feveral questions might here be agitated, concerning the mode of the divine operation, and its confiftency with free will. But—to speak the truth, and obviate the impertinence of fuch questionsin what manner the Holy Spirit acts upon, and influences our minds, it is no more our concern to know; than it was the concern of the diseased in Israel to know how Christ cured their bodies. operations feem to be analogous; and are both perhaps equally inexplicable. sufficient for the diseased, that they obtained relief: and it is sufficient for us. that we are youchfafed affiftance. power of Christ to heal, was manifest from the cures he wrought: and the power of the Spirit to fanctify, is manifest from the reformation of finners. The reality both of the one and the other operation stands attested by the consequent effects. They that were cured and restored to health, proved that they were fo, by performing all all the functions and actions of a found and healthy body; by discharging the offices of the animal life. And they that are sanctified, prove themselves, in like manner, to be under the government and influence of the Holy Spirit, by excreising all the virtues and graces of a religious and spiritual life; by forming their temper, and adjusting their conduct, to the precepts and example of Christ.

This proof then we should be solicitous to exhibit, for the benefit of the world, and our own comfort. All pretences to the Spirit, grounded on any other bottom, are vain and delusive. For "as many as are led by the Spirit of God"," are careful to obey the commandments of God; and to bring forth fruits worthy of the Spirit. Now "the fruits of the Spirit are in all goodness, righteousness, and truth":" that is, consist in the practice of m Rom. viii. 14.

n Ephef. v. 9.

all moral virtues; and more especially in the exercise of benevolence, justice, sincerity, purity, temperance and peace. these things be in us, and abound," they shew, undeniably shew, that we are actuated by a divine principle. A principle that " will not permit us to be either inactive. or unfruitful, in the knowledge of our - Lord Jesus Christ ... " But he that lacketh these things, is blind" to his own advantage; "fees not" the heinoufness of refishing the motions of the Holy Spirit; " and is strangely forgetful" of his baptismal engagements; and of that " purification from fin 9," which, if he had not been wanting to himself, he might certainly have obtained in virtue of that ordinance, by which he was initiated into the Christian church.

And fince it must prove of the most satal consequence, to fall from those bright views

º 2 Pet. i. 1.

P Ibid.

⁹ Ibid. ver. 9; and the Commentators on the place.

and exalted privileges, which Christianity fets before us; let us " therefore, my brethren; endeavour with so much the more diligence to make our calling and election fure." Let us strive, by the divine assistande, to answer the good purpose of God concerning us. Let us labour faithfully in our vocation and ministry: and study to fulfil, as far as we are able, all the obligations of duty. "If we do these things, we shall never fall ... 'God will support us with communications of grace, suitable to our state and necessities: will render us equal to the difficulties of our warfare; and bring it at last to a glorious issue. " For so an entrance shall be richly and abundantly ministered unto us," to admit us "into the everlafting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." We shall not only be secure of obtaining happiness there; but shall be received into it with circumstances of distinguished honour. For those graces, which adorned

r 2 Pet. i. 10.

[·] Ibid.

¹ lbid. ver. 11, See Dodridge's Fam. Exp.

adorned our profession here on earth, will attend us at last, in a radiant train, to those heavenly mansions of bliss and glory, which the divine mercy shall then assign us, through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ.

To whom, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be ascribed, as is most due, all honour, adoration, and praise, both now and for ever-more. Amen.

1 v • • • :

2 TIM. i. 10.

And hath brought life and immortality to light, through the Gospel.

E have already seen, what a perfect and complete rule of life Jesus Christ has delivered in the Gospel for the moral improvement of mankind. And we have also seen, what powerful affishances he has graciously vouchsafed to enable them to obey its directions.

But, notwithstanding mankind were thus enlightned with the knowledge of their duty, and and strengthned likewis; with abilities to perform it; yet, as they found themselves obliged to refrain from many things which appeared desirable, and to embrace as many that were very grievous, to slesh and blood; so was it moreover necessary, that some weighty and affecting motives should be proposed and laid before them, to dispose and determine them to act accordingly:—motives sufficient, as well to restrain them from the pursuit of vice under its most engaging appearance; as to urge them forwards in the practice of virtue against the most pressing discouragements.

But such motives could not be drawn from any thing that occurred in the present state. The arguments sounded on the dignity, amiableness, and advantages of virtue, how clearly soever and elegantly displayed, had but little effect on the general conduct of mankind; and were much too weak to withstand the violence of strong temptations, and the terrours of severe and alarming trials. To men, whose views were confined to this world, that conduct must necessarily appear by far the wisest and most advantageous, which was most likely to ease them of the pains and troubles, and to procure them the pleasures, of the present life. And since the pleasures and pains, or the happiness and misery of the present life, are by no means regularly connected with the moral character of mankind; but rather dispensed in a seemingly promiscuous and indiscriminate manner; it is obvious to conclude, that persons, actuated by the foregoing principles, would naturally be led to sacrifice the interest of distressed virtue to the engaging allurements of more prosperous vice.

But, though the appetites and passions generally prevailed, and inclined them to low and unworthy pursuits; yet there still subsisted in every man's breast an indelible sense of the manifest difference between good and evil; and the distates of conscience, selt within ", forcibly pressed them to avoid the one, and to embrace the other. Hence they perceived themselves to be as well moral, as rational, agents; and consequently accountable for all their actions. And fince they clearly faw, from the present unequal dispensations of providence, that a proper account of human actions was not taken in this world; the wisest and most considerate of them reasonably inferred, or rather feelingly presaged, that there must be of necessity a future state; in which all these things would be finally settled, and every one should receive the just and due reward of his deeds.

" Dominans ille in nobis deus. Ciccro.

Such notice did nature suggest concerning the reality of another life. And upon this notice, strengthned perhaps by traditionary accounts, the world entertained some confused belief of a future invisible state, throughout all ages. But this belief, however universal, was so weak and languid, that it could never support the cause of virtue; especially when struggling with difficulties and distress. In that case, men stood in need of suller evidence; and seem in truth to have occasionally obtained it, in a degree and manner suited to their peculiar conditions and capacities. In general however, mankind kind were left entirely to themselves, and to their own reasonings. And the effect was, that they soon sunk into doubts and uncertainties, which they knew not how to dispel.

When common sense was thus at a stand, some assistance, perhaps, might be expected from philosophy. But the philosophers, instead of clearing it up, involved the subject in greater obscurity; and perplexed the world with their various and contradictory opinions about it. Some affirmed, that the soul died and perished with the body; others maintained, that it was incorruptible and immortal; but the far greater part of them sluctuated perpetually in their sentiments, unable to determine where to fix *.

While it laboured therefore under fuch inconfiftencies, the doctrine of immortality

P 2

311

Eunt, qui discessum animi a corpore putent esse mortem. Sunt, qui nullum censent sieri discessum, sed una animum et corpus occidere, animumque in corpore exitingui. Qui discedere animum censent, alii statim dissipari, alii diu permanere, alii semper. Ciceron. Tuscul. Disp. l. i. c. ix. Harum sententiarum quæ vera sit deus aliquis viderit: quæ verisimillima magna quæstio est. Ibid. c. xi.

and a future state could be of little or no fervice to the real purposes of virtue and godliness. Of this indeed its most strenuous advocates feem to have been fully fen-For it is very remarkable, that, though they treated fo largely and fo frequently of the rewards and punishments of another life; yet, they feldom or never attempted to apply them to any of those pious and noble ends, which they were excellently fitted to answer. They seldom or never applied them to the suppression of vice, or the encouragement of virtue. They never applied them, either to restrain the giddy career of the thoughtless and abandoned; or to comfort the well-disposed under the various troubles of this mortal life, and raife them above the fear of death. The arguments they used for these purposes were drawn from other topics: from the baseness and infamy of an evil course; and from the credit and reputation that attended a good one: from the fufficiency of virtue for the completion of its own happiness: and from the confideration that things, which cannot be avoided, should be cheerfully and courageoully endured. Arguments of infinitely weaker force than those which are suggested by the hopes and sears, that nature has implanted in every mind, with regard to the allotments of futurity.

But this, alas! was not the worst. Philosophy, at length, did greater mischief. It even deadened the influence of these natural passions; and deprived virtue of its strongest guards. For, as by representing Hades (the place of departed, but virtuous, souls) to be a gloomy and disconsolate region 2, it damped Iliad xvi. 856. Yuxh dix feliar, &c.

Odyff. xi. 488. Βυλοίμην κ' ἐπάρυς 👁 , &c.

---- xxiv. 6. Ως δ'ότε πυκτερίδες, &c,

And though Plato, in the beginning of his third Republic, censures these passages, and would have them expunged, as injurious to the welfare of society; since they tend to weaken the courage of men, and make them as a death: yet is he obliged to acknowledge in his Cratylus, that the sentiments contained therein were so deeply fixed in the minds of the common people,

J Vide Ciceron. Tuscul. Disputationes, lib. ii. & iv. et alibi passim.

² Thus HOMER, the great divine of the heathen world, represents the souls in Hades as disconsolate, and lamenting their condition. See damped the hopes of good men; and checked that ardour of desire, with which they naturally panted after some future, unexperienced joys, that would make amends for their present sufferings; so, by divesting the deity of punitive justice*, of the will and capacity of doing any hurt, it freed the wicked from the terrouts of vengeance; and fet them loose to pursue the bent of their vicious inclinations without controul. consequence was just what might be expected. Probity and virtue declined apace; while vice and dissoluteness gathered strength; and spread their baneful, destructive influence, through all orders and degrees of people.

Nor was this the state of the Gentiles only. The Jews, attached to the temporal promises, and insected, many of them, with that they could by no means be perfuaded to think otherwise of Hades, than of a region uncomfortable, gloomy, and difinal and therefore greatly dreaded by them, ² Hoc quidem commune est omnium philosophorum---runquam nec irasci deum, nec nocere. Cicro De Officiis, lib. iii. cap. xxviii, See more in Bp. WARBURTON'S Div. Legat. vol. II. b. iii. § 6.

the principles of Sadducism, were nearly in For though we should as bad a condition. allow, that the doctrine of immortality and a future state was most prevalent among them; yet they feem to have been but little attentive to the vast and important consequences of it. They advanced no higher in the practice of virtue, than the others did, who had no hopes; and were guilty of as many and great vices, as the worst of them, who had nothing to fear beyond the grave.

At fuch a crisis, it is obvious to infer, what great need there was of a divine revelation to strengthen and confirm the dictates of nature; and to ascertain the reality of a future state: to inculcate and impress on mankind the lasting importance of true religion, by awakening their minds to a proper sense of the divine justice; which is equally concerned to punish the wicked, as to reward the good.

Accordingly at this period, Christ recommended, after a fignal manner, his love and kindness to us-in that he "brought life and immortality to light through the Gof-pel:" in that he established the sentiments and expectations of nature; and improved the intimations given by the law: in that he illustrated the doctrine of a future state: and cleared it of all the doubts and difficulties, under which it had before laboured. For the Gospel not only assures us of the world to come; but lays it open to our view in the plainest and the fullest manner: describes it with such particular circumstances, and delineates it by such affecting representations, as are most admirably fitted to promote the ends of true religion:-admirably fitted, to reclaim us from the practice of the most alluring vice; and to animate us in the discharge of the most hazardous duty.

P 4

To this purpose we are informed, that is as it is appointed for all men once to die, so after that there will come a judgment is when we shall all appear at the tribunal of Christ, to give an account of the things we have done; and to receive for those things accordingly "." For "when the fon of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit on the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations ". When they stand before him, both small and great, then shall the books be opened; and all shall be judged according to the things written in those books". And as there is nothing covered which shall not be revealed, and nothing hid that shall not be known sit; " so there is nothing, which shall not receive a just recompence of reward, suitable to its nature, whether good or evil.

When judgment is passed, a proper discrimination will take place; and every one shall inherit his destined and deserved portion. "To them, who, by patient continuance in well doing, sought," and prepared themselves for, a state of "immortal honour and glory;" Christ will at last graciously c 2 Cor. v. 10.

d Matth. xxv. 31, 32.

e Rev. xx. 12.

f Matth. x. 26.

render the great prize they so ardently purfued-even "eternal life" and eternal happinefs. "But to the" perverse and ungrateful "children of contention, who pertinaciously dispute against the truth; and, instead of obeying its righteous dictates, obstinately follow their own wicked ways, and prejudicate opinions;" he will render a quite different portion. For them is referved all that can be imagined most dreafful and tremendous. "Indignation" is conceived, and " wrath" shall break forth against them: the sharpest "tribulation," the most hopeless and inextricable "anguish," will burst out in a torrent of unmingled mifery on their hapless and guilty souls h; and will continue to torment them for ever and ever.

Such are the motives, that is, the promifes and threatnings, which Christ disclosed, in order to influence our moral conduct. And though these promises and threatnings reser to a future and distant world; yet, that he

³ Rom. ii. 7.

h Ibid. ver, 8. 9. See Doddringe in log.

affirmed nothing but what was true; that he promised or threatened no more, than what he can, and, in due time, will certainly perform; we have all the evidence imaginable to believe.

For what can be more evident, than that we are defined, though mortal, to live again; "when Christ, our head," rose from the grave; and visibly ascended to resume his glory in that state, from whence he had come down to reveal it unto us?

And fince an eternal state awaits us, what can be more evident, than that he, who was able to blast and destroy by the word of his mouth, to strike offenders dead by the ministry of his servants k, in this present world; must be likewise able to afflict and take vengeance on them in that suture world, of which he is equally the ford and governor? What can be more evident, than that he, who was able to support the weary multitudes, and to relieve their hunger with food, i Matth. xxi. 19. Mark xi. 14, 20.

^{*} Acts v. 5, 10. xiii. 11.

in the wilderness; must be able also to satisfy the righteous to the extent of their defires, and fill them with all spiritual comforts, in heaven?

But evident as it is, yet this point may receive some farther illustration; or at least, the propriety of the miracles by which it is supported may become more conspicuous; if we particularly consider the nature of those emblems, under which the enjoyments of another life are in Scripture represented to us.

Now, as the foundation of happiness is laid in freedom from pain and sufferings; so heaven is accordingly described as a place of perfect ease and security: where "there thall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain; for Christ shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." And what plainer proof, what surer pledge could he give, that he will here-m Rév. xxi 4.

¹ Matth. xiv. 15, &c. xv. 32, &c. Mark vi. 35, &c. vi.i. 1, &c. Luke ix. 12, &c. John vi. 5, &c.

after preserve his faithful servants in persect ease; and defend them from every thing hurtful and annoying; than his having already wrought, for their comfort and relief, so many salutary and ease-dispensing miracles?—than his having raised some particular persons from the dead; and his having removed from others those maladies and torments, which were the cause of their forrows, troubles, and afflictions?

If we advance now from ease to enjoyment; the same observation will hold good. The blessings of another life are often represented by the comforts of this. When we are given to understand, how completely, happy the righteous shall be in the world to come; it is expressly said, that "they shall hunger no more, nor thirst any more; for Christ shall feed them, and lead them unto sountains of living waters"." If then the felicities of the spiritual world stand thus described under the vail or covering of temporal enjoyments; what more significant instance, what more appropriate example could our Saviour produce, of his ability to supply all the longings and desires of the soul; than his satisfying to the full the analogous cravings and appetites of the body?—which he more than once miraculously did.

But whatever rewards on the one hand, or whatever punishments on the other, may be referved for men in a future state; yet manifest it is, that they can only take place in consequence of the final judgment. That there is a judgment to come, nature dictates, and revelation confirms. In compaffion to mankind, this judgment, we are informed, is committed to Christ. And that this information is true, who can now possibly dispute, when his power to judge the world was so visibly displayed; and the form of his proceedings fo circumstantially represented, in the fate of the Jewish nation?

He told them, before his death, that, as fure as the Jewish polity should be destroyed, and the inhabitants of Judea be visited for their iniquities; so surely should the frame of the universe be dissolved: and the inhabitants of the earth be summoned to judgment?. One part of this prediction has been already fulfilled; and that in fo extraordinary a manner, as plainly shewed it to be the work of Christ. The other therefore will be fulfilled in its season; at the time determined by the Father. And when that determined time is come, can it ever be doubted, that he, who, in this judicial manifestation, made fuch an apparent difference between the believing and unbelieving Jews; will also, in that future determination, of which this was the emblem, make again the like distinction between the righteous and the wicked: hetween them that served him in fear and reverence, and them that despised and transgreffed his laws?

[•] See the passages referred to in p. 220.

Matth. ch. xxiv. 29-31. Dr. Jackson's Works, vol. I.
b. i. ch. xxiv.

The interpolition of a divine power was so clearly visible in the overthrow of Jerusalem, that TITUS himself ascribed his taking that city to the assistance of God. JOSEPH. de Bello Jud. lib. vi. c. ix. § 1.

There are some passages in the Gospels, nearly allied to this subject, which, as they have been groffly perverted to the base purposes of infidelity, it may be proper to recall to their destined use. The passages I mean are those, which give us, an account of the repeated demands made by the Jews, that our Saviour would shew them "a sign from heaven." The fign they referred to, is thus described by the prophet Daniel. "I saw in the night visions, and behold one like the fon of man came with the clouds of heaven: and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him ." Now the dominion of Christ was then to be established, when the Jewish polity was destroyed. Our Saviour therefore, perceiving that they knew not what they asked, "fighed deeply in his spirit; and said, An evil and adulterous generation feeketh after a fign: and there shall no fign be given it, but the fign of the prophet Jonas. For as Jonas r Ch. vii. 13, 14.

Mark viii. 12.

wasthere days and three nights in the whale's belly; so shall the Son of Man be three days and there nights in the heart of the earth."

Thus far he draws the parallel in plain and explicit terms: farther becould not openly advance without danger of exciting their refentment. But from this intimation, son nected with the sequel of the history of Jonah, the serious and contemplative might easily perceive the full sorce and purport of the answer; which was indeed most pertinently adapted to their urgent, though fataly demand.

The history informs us, that Jouah was fent by Almighty God to preach repentance to the sinful Ninevites. He preached accordingly; and enforced his exhortations with this argument—" yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown"." Christ was fent in like manner to work the conversion of the sinful Jews; and he urged it upon them by the very same argument. For substitute now a year for a day, acc-[·] Matth. Xii. 39, 40.

[&]quot; Jonah iii. 4.

cording to the stile of the prophetic land guage; and the such of this reasoning will plainly appear from the tenour of the parallel, so issue at last in this way years, unless we repent, and Jerusalem many be destroyed." And as they repeated aut, destroyed it was, exactly at the end of that predicted period a position bessele.

That our Saviour Bad this event and view, and alluded to it in his foveral and fivers; is not only evident from the foveraging reasons; but receives fift additional confirmation from his subsequent, and made open declarations. When the distibles fiewed him the buildings of the temple, he plainly told them, that, "there fibuild life be left one stone upon another, that the floud that he he thrown down; "and that this flint.

For though upon their repentance at Jonah's preaching, "God also repented of the rest shift hereafted do undergone this preaching, "God also repented of the exit shift hereafted do unto them;" yet forty wars after, when they relapfed again, Nineven was destroyed: as plainly appears from the last chapter of the book of Tobit, ver. 8. and 15. And must therefore have been known to the Jews.

Magth. xxiv. 2.

should happen within the short and narrow limit of that present generation. This was clear and precise enough. But in his final answer to the high priest he was still more explicit; and feems to have purposely adjusted his reply to the circumstances of the case before us.

When the high priest adjured him, that he would inform the council, "Whether he was the Christ, the Son of God; Jesus faith unto him, Thou hast said ":" that is, he answered them to this effect-" You have all the reason in the world to conclude, that I am the promifed Messiah, I have given you, the fullest and most incontestable proofs of it. I have shewed you all the figns; and performed all the miracles, which the prophets had foretold the Messiah should perform: and yet ye will not believe. There is one fign indeed, mentioned by the prophet Daniel, which you have frequently demanded to see; and which I have hitherto, in mercy, forborn to display; though I have as frequently reminded you both of the certainty and dreadfulness of it. Nevertheless, as the measure of your iniquities is growing to the full, this figh shall also be shortly extilibited. For "hereafter," and at no long distance, "ye shall see the Son of Man, sitting on the right hand of power; and coming in the clouds of heaven," to take vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel."

2 Matth. xxvi. 63, 64.

Such was our Savidin's confluct, and with the mode of reasoning he used on these confluence of the most interested prejudiced, could possibly confuse this conduct? could possibly affect from this mode of reasoning, that Christ discouraged all rational inquiry, as confesses that he could not, with respect to the evidence of his divine mission, fatisfy the understandings of discerning men ? But this infinitation is as false, as it is implois. He was always forward to promote their inquiry; always ready to clear up their doubts. urged them with proofs upon proofs, and miracles upon miracles; and therefore left them without excuse. Whatever our modern infidels may think, even "the men of Nineyeh hall rife up in the judgment with that generation, and shall condemn it: for they repented at the preaching of Jonas'," which was supported at most but by one miracle; whereas these perversely withflood the most falutary admonitions, supported by the strength of repeated proofs, and the united force of numberless miracles. And fince their behaviour was fo incorrigibly vile; how justly did they fall under the weighty rigour of that fign, which they had so often imperiously demanded.

Matth. xxvi. 64.

Christianity not founded on argument.

Dreadful were the things which befel the infidels of that age. "But all those things happened unto them for ensamples: and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come;" and to whom is committed the last dispensation of grace and mercy. Let us therefore be admonished by them; and be especially careful that we " tempt not Christ," who has graciously been pleased to take us under his conduct and protection; and who has honoured his church with fo many demonstrative tokens of his presence. Let us take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of us an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living Godf," and rejecting the Gospel-revelation. For fore will be their "condemnation," if, "when light is come into the world, men" will perversely thut their eyes; and still continue to "love darkness rather than light;" for fear " their deeds should be reproved "." But whether they are reproved in this world or not; yet, there is now opened another scene, in which, we are fure, they shall finally meet with condign punishment. For "the Lord cometh with ten thousands of his faints, to execute judgment upon all; and" more f Heb. iii. 12.

d Matth. xii. 41.

e 1 Cor. x. 11.

⁵ John iii. 19, 20.

especially "to convict those who have lived ungodly, of all the impious deeds, which they have impiously committed, and of all the hard, irreligious speeches, which ungodly sinners have spoken against him b."

How we shall be brought, though subject to death, to stand up at the future judgment; and what will be the particular confequences of it; I shall have occasion to consider more largely hereafter.

In the mean time, "bleffed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope—unto the hope of life—by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." Amen.

h Jude, ver. 14, 15,

f Pet, i. 3.

2 TIM. i. 10.

Who hath abolished death, and bath brought life and immortality to light, through the Gospel.

In my last Discourse I represented to you, in how clear a light the Gospel of Christ had placed the doctrine of a suture state; and what evident proofs it gave to the world of the certainty of a suture retribution,

But the doctrine of retribution in a future state, however clearly proved, was yet attended with certain difficulties, which mere reason reason could never resolve; and which therefore called for the aid and affistance of some farther discovery than could possibly be obtained on the principles of nature. men should be accountable in another state for the things they had done in this, reason allowed to be fit and right; but then the difficulty in the eye of reason was, how they could be brought into that state to render the account required. Mankind are mortal; destined to perish by the stroke of death before the judgment comes. By this intervening destruction the scene is in all appearance closed; and judgment entirely excluded. For though it be acknowledged that our fouls furvive; yet, these alone cannot in equity be answerable for our actions. For our actions are not the actions of pure spirits or fouls; but the actions of men; that is, of fouls and bodies united. And therefore it follows, that, in order to be restored to the integrity of our nature, and put in a condition to answer for ourselves; our souls should again be united to our bodies, and the same individuals recalled to life. But of fuch fuch a restoration or resurrection to life nature afforded no examples. For "what is there in the whole compass of beings that yields a similitude of dust and ashes rising up again into regular bodies, and to a state of perpetual immortality"? According then to the conclusions of nature, mankind, it should seem, must for ever continue under the power of death, without any hope of being delivered from it. And their continuance in that state must necessarily cut them off from all connections with the concerns of futurity.

On this view of things, death, you fee, stands as a perpetual bar to judgment; and throws such difficulties in the way of suture rewards and punishments, as render the exertion of them void and impracticable. But as death had originally no place in nature, if you suppose it again removed; or, which is the same thing, suppose that our bodies should hereafter be rescued from the power of the grave; and raised up again to a state of incorruptibility; then all the difficulties wants at once—and leave us, as in a perfect capacity, so in full expectation, of being fully called to give an account.

^{*} Bp. Sherlock, vol. I. difc. vi. p. 205.

Now, what we have here delivered by way of supposition, the Gospel has advanced to clear reality. For it affures us that Christ " has abolished death" ... " and will raise us up at the last day! " " that the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and shall come forth.". And need I prove that the voice of Christ is such a powerful voice-adequate to this mighty performance? The dead have proved it long ago: who felt its quickening energy in the grave, and role up to attest its efficacy . His own refurrection placed it farther out of doubts as it exhibited, with the rest, not only a proof, but also an example, of the very doctrine.

¹ John vi. 44.

M John v. 28, 29.

Matth, ix. 24, 25, xxvii. 52, 53. Mark v. 35-43. Luke vii. 11---15. viii. 49---56. John xi. 43, 44.

237

Since Christ then has alleady given his such convincing proofs of his power to det liver than the dominion of death, both by edifing himself and others; we may well assured, on the strength of this pledge, that whis wonders shall ugain be ones above show the destruction. And although the worms destruction and his faithfulness in destruction, the proof of these we show that the strength we may still be considered, we may still be considered, we may still be considered, we say still be considered, we say still be considered with the strength our steels we shall be considered with the strength of the s

But this is not the whole. For Chill has not only abolished death, and entitled us to the phivilege of a future refurection, but his what after brought life und insubmitablely to light by the Gospel:" that is, he has revealed and described to us the nature and circumstances of that eternal state—whether of trappiness or milesy—so which we shall be configued at the final judgment. For, as the findge of the earth must then dooright: for will headivatify our fate and condition, eccording as our works shall bein And therefore eternal life must be supposed to include, as well the punishments of the obdic and swickeds as the remards of the virtuous and ed in the aute, and his faithfeln higgs anthowse fined the litighteous that the lade valued to complete happiness in another life, their nature will be improved in both parts of its composition, ito a degree suitable sonfuch a heavenly, states. They hall no longer be fubject to ideath and corruptions but " shall be equal' to the angels, and the children of God, being the children of the refurredion ".' Their bodies shall no longer appear base, viles and contemptibles but " shall be fashioned by the power of Christ into the form and likenest of his own glorious body 12" shall be atraved with the same splendor that his own assumed atothe transfiguration &; and then continue to think a Luke xx. 36.

[•] Pfal. lxxxviii. 11.

^{*} Job xix. 25--27.

forth

Philip. iii. 21.

Matth. xvii. 2.

forth thousever, abuthe dans and the kingdome of she Father til (Their fouls in like mainte? thaltepartaken of egreaticand marivellous inner efoldadheratus Aframitadi intremovore Think Hallindiana, and be made person in all the excellencies of rational nature ifin wildowinknew Respire hobidels worth pusity: and that in digital the state of the state o pany must be very great, yapaninin nashiri - And inthey through a simplified confolled and defined allevia the collection of their tanderic Edet isi the continuous polaris real of obstacles profested as:a place to suspencional established dor, diginity, aind magnificant as it is digitally digit deinschieblichen icheschieben of ittele gradt the shoot to thing in its for the glory of Godifilminates its and thoo Lainbelands and his wisdom in the mai "Abovedadingit nett, bish abeging rome enough ment the man and it is a shedompany is venerables For in the solids world the rightedus shall be admitted to the blissful and improving " fociety of angels; to the igeneral affembly and church of the first-born which are written in helicit perfect to the spirits of spirits men made perfect before them?" Athemated in reconsummate peace, lover and friendship signing and sections mutual joys and mediable facilities.

^{*} Matth. xiii. 43.

: But; though the disprinch relating their the lively dealey them of so glodious is bounpany must be very great, yet will its received a fill further addition from those holy exercifes and beatific employments in which the blefied the continually engaged. To live in the reviving presence of God, and to behold the transcendent glory of his triangly; to bontemplate "the perfections of the great Muchor and Preferver of the universe; 40 consider his power in the creation of things. and his wisdom in the marvellous addits medit of this hand to reflect un dis goodness displayed in the ends they are intended to serve, and on this kitch falmers in the execurion of his themovolent purposes 100 media

* Heb. xii. 22, 23.

tate on the nature of his righteous laws, and to trace out the excellency of his manifold dispensations: these are acts that will fill their minds with fublime delights, and raise in their fouls the devoutest admiration. the ardour of this admiration, and in a grateful sense of the bleffings they enjoy; they will continually be carried on to praise and adore their God with all the energy of their exalted powers. They will constantly be led, in an uniform tenour of ferene delight, to extol the wonders of his creating love; to magnify the mercies of his redeeming grace; and to celebrate the triumphs of their victorious Saviour. Thus are the faints perpetually employed: thus do they "always rejoice in the Lord;" and improve in blis as they rise in thanksgivings.

And at the same time that they are enjoying the happiness of their present state, they can also look forwards to still higher pleasures. "For in God's presence there is" not only, at any given period, "a fulness of joy;" but "at his right hand there are pleasures," that will issue forth "for everVol. II. R

242 SERMON XXII.

more y." A circumstance that crowns and dignifies the whole; fince it shews the happiness of another life to be as lasting as it is exquisite: to be indeed permanent, unchangeable, and eternal. They who are once admitted into that heavenly state, are admitted into a state of perpetual security. They shall be raised for ever above all fear of change. No hazards thall befal them: no new trials affault them: the arm of omnipotence will protect them: and the presence of the Lord will constantly refresh them. They shall never be weary of their condition; never be fatiated with the tireforme circulation of the same objects; for some new glory will everlastingly break out upon them, . to perpetuate their comforts, and to improve their delights.

Such is the account of that future happinels, discovered to us by the revelation of Jesus Christ. And who sees not, from this account, what mighty reasons we have, to praise and adore the divine goodness, which has favoured us with such glorious discoveries? Discoveries, not more illustrious and magnificent in themselves, than advantageous to the interests of virtue. Discoveries. which manifestly tend to elevate and ennoble our nature; to inspire us with a superlative greatness of mind; and to form us to a godlike temper. When we look, through the medium of the Gospel-revelation, into the true state and real felicities of the other world; when we consider what exalted spiritual joys, what refined enravishing delights, we are fure hereafter to be partakers of: when these things are the subject of our ferious thoughts, the world and its enjoyments lessen to our view; the pleasures of fense grow sick to the taste; and the allurements that furround us lose their power. Earthly grandeur, pomp, and splendor, the usual objects of our admiration, will then shine with diminished lustre: will then indeed appear "to have no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that infinitely excelleth it."

y Pfal. xvi. 11.

2 2 Cor. iii. 10.

SERMON XXII.

And when we consider farther, that the happiness of the other life is the portion only of the "pure in heart;" the peculiar "inheritance of them that are fanctified : " how forcibly must this consideration move us, to "purify outselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit; and to perfect holiness in the fear of God "!" And though we may be subject in this religious course to reproaches, distresses, persecutions, and death; yet how noble and animating is the encouragement we have to " patient continuance in well-doing!"—when we are certain, " that the fufferings of this present life are not worthy to be compared with the glory, which shall be revealed in use:" when we are certain, that they are the very means, appointed by providence, of " working out

^{*} Acts xxvi 18.

^{5 2} Cor. vii. 1.

c Rom, viii. 18, for us a far more exceeding, even an eternal weight of glory a."

And when we reflect moreover, that these great and precious promises are not confined to any particular nation, or to a number of men of distinguished eminence; but are graciously extended and freely offerred to the whole race of mankind: what winning obligations do they lay upon us to ferve God, in our feveral stations, with all readiness of mind, and sincerity of affection: and to press forwards in the ways of yirtue with ardour, diligence, and affiduity! Sure at last of being rewarded for our pains, with a degree of happiness, proportioned to the measure and increase of our holiness. This happiness indeed is distant; and promised to our fidelity, only in heaven. But however, that we might have at present sufficient proof of the reality and existence of such a place; our Saviour miraculously ascended thither, in open day, and before many witnesses. And this ascension of Christ, as our head, is both d 2 Cor. iv. 17.

R 3

a pledge

245 SERMÓN XXII.

a pledge and affurance to us, that we also, as members of his body, shall finally ascend after him; partake of his promises; and share the selicities of that blessed place.

Hence then it appears, that these promises, as they were intended, are excellently adapted, to work on men of ingenuous minds: to promote and secure their escape from the pollutions and vices that are generally prevalent in this world; and to advance those pious dispositions in their souls, which may sit and prepare them for the kingdom of heaven.

But all men have not the ingenuity to be worked upon by these milder encouragements. The stubborn, the vicious, and the profligate, stand in need of more awakening motives: such as may check the violence of their passions; and awe them into a sober, serious sense of their folly, and their danger. The Gospel therefore, adapting its discoveries to our several dispositions, at the same time that it promulges the most glorious rewards to the sincerely pions, faithful, and obedient; denounces likewise the most awful punish-punishments against all presumptuous and impenitent offenders.

. As " the righteous shall inherit eternal life, and eternal happiness; so the wicked · shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power." " They shall lie down for ever in tribulation and anguish; in a place of perpetual torment; " " where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quencheds." The expressions are strong and pungent; fitted to rouse the apprehensions of men; and to make them attentive to the consequence of their actions. very nature starts, and draws back from milery; and how then must we be affected with the dreadful affurance of mifery ever-- lasting? "If we are afraid of them who can kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do; how much rather should me fear him, who, after he hath killed, c 2 Theff. i. 9.

f Romu ii. 9. Rev. xiv. 10, 11.

s Mark ix. 44, 46, 48.

SERMON XXII.

hath power to cast both soul and body into hell-fire h?"

This general determination, though it feems to include all the wicked in one common fate; does yet in reality by no means imply, that they shall all be punished with equal severity. On the contrary, we are assured, that their punishments will be exactly proportioned to their crimes; and as some "shall be beaten with sewer," so others shall seel more numerous, "stripes;" according to the measure of their different offences.

But perhaps it may be thought, "that even the lowest degree of punishment; continued through the ages of eternity, is more than adequate to the just demerit of the most heinous crimes, that we can possibly commit in the short compass of this mortal life; and that it is, consequently, repugnant both to the justice; and goodness of Luke xii. 4, 5.

³ Ibid. ver. 47, 48.

God, that such punishments should be inslicted."

Now. should this be our mode of thinking; it would be but right to think again, whether the fufferings of another life be not founded in the nature of things; and are as much the refult, the necessary consequences, of our finful proceedings, as positive inflictions of the Deity for them! In this world we know that fin and mifery are closely connected; that one momentary wrong action often exposes us to a train of evils, that will continue to afflict us as long as we live. And fince this world and the next are but two parts of one moral fystem; why may not the same constitution, that we find to be established here, equally proceed, and take place hereafter? Why may there not be the fame close connection between vice and misery in a future state, as there is between them now in the present! And if fo, fince death makes no change in our moral principles; but we pass into the other world with the tempers and dispositions tions we had formed in this; must not the fame vicious passions, the same irregular defires, the same evil habits, and the same wicked actions, that rendered us miferable through the course of this life, continue to keep us in that wretched flate through the whole extent of our being?... that is, must not wicked men be for ever Subject to the natural; consequences of their own wickedness? For what reason, have we to think, that the goodness of God should be prove concerned to prevent or suspend those eternal sufferings, which attend our vices in another world: than to prevent, or suspend those temporal sufferings, which are the present effects of the same causes? All that his goodness could oblige him to do, was to put us on our guard, by giving us warning of these distant evils; and that he has done in the most reffectual manner. He has informed us by politive laws how completely milerable our condition must be wif we indulge ourselves in evil adjons: and that topp mulged mulged them by way of punishments demounced, rather than by simple predictions, that they might enter more deeply into our minds, and more powerfully influence our practice. But if men, notwithstanding these forcible admonitions, will yet indulge wrong choice, and purfue the bent of their vicious inclinations; is it not evidently just and reasonable, that they should suffer the consequences of these proceedings; and be left to feel the eternal weight of that misery, which they would not be persuaded to avoid?

Not is the infliction of such misery either less just or less reasonable, considered as the positive punishment of sin, dispensed immediately by the hand of the Almighty. The laws of God, or the rules of divine government, are graciously adjusted to the welfare and happiness of mankind. And these laws, as all others, require to k King's Orig. of Evi', App. § ii, p. 498.

SERMON XXII.

be enforced by proper and suitable sanctions: that is, by such measures of rewards and punishments as are sitted to produce obedience to them. And if it appears, as it is indeed but too apparent, that nothing less than the positive denunciation of eternal misery is sufficient to answer that end and purpose; then is it so far from being repugnant, that it is entirely conformable both to the wisdom and goodness of God, to place such terrours before us, in order to prevent us from ruining ourselves.

And if it be confistent with the goodness of God to threaten us with such punishments, in order to deter us from sin and ruin; it cannot surely be inconsistent either with that, or any other attribute, to execute those punishments on the daring and impenitent; and to continue the infliction so long upon them, as there are beings in existence, that need to be deterred and restrained from vice, or consirmed and improved in virtue. But such there will always be. And therefore there will be always a reason for the eternal continuance of those punishments, which are threatened to the wicked in another life.

And should it here be objected, that this reason cannot be true, because it is manifestly founded on cruelty; and reprefents them to be kept in misery merely for the benefit of others; then let it be remarked with regard to themselves, that. fince they are immortal, and continue wicked through the ages of eternity, the punishment of that wickedness, whether resulting from the constitution of things, or positively inflicted by the hand of God. must necessarily continue full as long, as they continue to deserve it :-- and confequently, that immortal beings of eternal malignity justly deserve to suffer eternally.

Such then are the motives, which the Christian religion lays before us, to counterbalance the influence of those allurements that would engage us in a wrong course:

courle; and to encourage our progress, notwithstanding all the difficulties that may oppose us, in the ways of truth and righteousness. And what can prevail, if these cannot? Weightier motives can never be proposed to the understanding of men, than everlasting punishment and life eternal; than the greatest and most durable happiness, and the most intolerable and lasting mifery that human nature is capable of. In this discovery the Gospel seems to triumph; and to rest thereupon all its power. By means of this discovery, and the concurring influence of divine grace, how powerful did it formerly appear! In confequence of the prospect it opened to their view, what manner of persons" did its first and earliest professors become, "in all holy conversation and godliness of living 1!" How "piously, justly, and unblameably did they behave themselves; in the midst of a wicked and perverse generation, among whom

1 2 Pet. iil. 11.

SERMON XXII.

whom they shone as lights in the world "!" They well confidered, how fearful a thing it is to fall under the vengeance of an angry God; and therefore laboured with all their power to avoid it. They well confidered, how joyful and happy a thing it is to attain the favour of an approving Deity; and therefore strove, by a careful observance of his righteous laws, to secure their title to it. With what awful caution did they endeavour to guard against every fin, for fear 'of incurring the threatened punishment! And with what ardent zeal did they aspire after every degree of virtue, in hopes of obtaining that glorious reward, which God has promifed to all them, who give such proof of their love to him?

But we have also the same rewards, and the same punishments placed before us. And "it is" the highest instance of "our wisdom and our understanding," seriously to act as becometh those, who are so deeply concerned in them. "If we would enter into life, we must keep the commandments";" and be ourselves, "as the commandments are, holy, righteous, just and good"." For these dispositions, and these only, can "make us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light?." Vicious passions, and vicious practices, will inevitably make us miserable: will lead us into mischiefs and distresses here; and expose us to eternal punishment hereafter.

256 SERMON XXII.

Let us therefore take heed to ourselves: and, if we mean to secure our happiness, be careful to regulate and adjust our conduct to the standard of the divine laws. For we must "become servants to God, and bring forth fruit unto holiness," if we

^{*} Matth. xix. 17.

[•] Rom. vii. 12.

^{*} Col. i. 12.

SERMON XXII. 257 expect that "the end shall be everlasting life"."

Now to God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, be ascribed, as is most due, all honour and glory, world without end. Amen.

9 Rom. vi. 22:

Vol. II. S SER

• ,

S E R M O N XXIII.

MARK. Xvi. 20.

And they went forth, and preached every where; the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with figns following.

IT appears, I hope, from what has been delivered in the foregoing Discourses, that the Gospel of Christ has fully supplied all the desiciences of the former dispensations; and made ample provision for the improvement and happiness of mankind. It has laid, as we have seen, "the foundation of repentance from dead works" on S 2

260 SERMÔN XXIII.

the affurance of pardon, purchased for us by our Saviour's merits: it points out to us the ways of truth and righteousness by a perfect rule of piety and morals, exemplified in the life of its divine Author: it helps our infirmities, and renders us equal to the difficulties of our duty, by the promised affistance of the Holy Spirit: and it animates us to the performance of that duty, by a clear discovery of a future state of rewards and punishments, to be dispensed according as our works deserve: all which it exhibits to us under the seal and confirmation of adequate and appropriate miracles.

Hence then it follows, that the Gospel has justified all its pretensions, as a complete institution for the recovery of man: since, by thus ministring "all those things, which are necessary to life and godliness;" it has put it in our power to free ourselves from the dominion of sin, and to "work out our own salvation."

Now this Gospel, or the religion it contains, though calculated and designed for the benefit of all; was at first communicated only only to a few: who were afterwards appointed to spread and convey it to the rest of the world.

But, notwithstanding their appointment to this work, yet so conscious were the disciples of their own weakness, and so fearful of giving offence to the Jews; that they could not, for a time, prevail on themselves, even to attempt the execution of it; but seemingly threw it up, as a difficult, or rather impracticable scheme; and returned again to their former employment. "Peter went a fishing:" and six more of the same occupation joined themselves to him.

When they had thus returned to their fecular employ, and were in danger of being immerfed in the concerns of the world; some, thing, it is plain, was necessary to be done; to revive their attention to their spiritual charge; and render them mindful of their religious engagements. Our Saviour therefore, as he had engaged their attendance at first by a striking miracle, sounded in their occupation, and adapted to their capacities— I mean, by a miraculous draught of fishes, and the affurance that "he would make them fishers of men';" so now, having invested them with that commission, and appointed them to convert the nations; he gave them a pledge of their future success by a repetition of the same miracle. For the draught which they had now made, was a fignificant emblem of what they should be farther enabled to do, when they came, under the influence and direction of Christ, to fish for men (if I may so speak) with the net of the Gospel. But then they were admonished by him, that if they meant to go on to any good purpose, and execute their commission in a proper manner; they must prefer his fervice to all worldly concerns, and be thoroughly disposed to "feed his fheep x;" to instruct those that were ready to hear

F John xx. 19.

^{*} Ibid xxi. 2, 3.

262 SERMON XXIII.

^{*} Luke v. 2---11.

u John xxi. 6.

^{*} Ibid. ver. 19. ΑΓαπος, με φλεῖον τύτων; If the words ωλεῖον τύτων made originally a part of the question, which, I confe's, I much doubt; then must they refer to the wessels and nets, in the manager.

hear them, with affectionate and inceffant care. For such I take to be the real import of that conversation, which he held with them, at the close of this miracle.

But though their inclinations were ever so good, and their concern to propagate the doctrine of their master ever so great; yet was there no likelihood, that they should make any considerable progress in the work by the mere force of their natural abilities. The task was evidently too arduous for the common powers of humanity to effect. And therefore they were commanded to "continue at Jerusalem, till they were endued with extraordinary power from on high;" adequate to the weight and mightiness of the management of which Peter was occupied: and the meaning must be—" Art thou more truly devoted to my service, than to thy own wordly concerns?" A meaning in no wise so flat and cold as some critics have suggested. The question, in this sense, naturally sprung from Peter's conduct. He was the first that returned to his former occupation, and carried the others with him---which betrayed an anxious concern for the world; and might therefore give rise to our Saviour's interrogations.

y John xxi. 15---19.

Luke xxiv. 49.

264 SERMON XXIII.

pointed time was come, God fent down his spirit upon them; and thereby endowed them with the necessary qualifications. He furnished them with such other is gifts of the Huly Ghost," as were requisite for the accomplishment of the divine purpose: requisite for the propagation of Christ's religion; and for the growth and establishment of his kingdom in the world.

Now, fince the special nature of these marvellous gifts, and the propriety of their application, depended in a great measure, on the nature of those peculiar exigences, which called for their exertion; we must previously consider the circumstances of things, as they stood at that time, before we can well know how properly these gifts were suited and adjusted to them.

Here then let it be observed, that, as the religion of Christ was manifestly intended for the common benefit of all nations; so the first thing requisite plainly was, that it should be accordingly conveyed to the knowledge knowledge of the nations. Now this could never be done, in any reasonable time; nor indeed with any considerable efficacy; but by conferring on the teachers of it the gift of languages, to qualify them to instruct the nations. Conformably therefore to the exigence of the case, when the Holy Ghost fell on the apostles, he ushered his administration with this very gift. For "they all spake with other tongues, as the spirit gave them utterance"."

Being thus endowed with the gift of languages, and qualified to instruct the nations; the next thing requisite seems to have been, that the doctrines, which Christ had delivered to them, and which they had now in charge to publish to the world, should be so treasured up, or at least revived again, in their memory, that none of them might be forgotten and lost. But this was more than their natural abilities could possibly insure. And therefore it was another part of the Spirit's office, to strengthen their faculties, "and bring all things again to their remembrance, whatsoever their master had said unto them b."

266 SERMON XXIII.

But then, as it was not sufficient merely to remember the doctrines of our Saviour, but necessary likewise to understand their true and proper meaning; to prove their divinity by suitable arguments; and to obviate the objections, which ignorance or malice might form against them; so the Holy Spirit did not only secure the apostles from errour, by "guiding them into all truth," and enlightning their understandings to judge unerringly of matters of faith; but "he gave them also a mouth and wisdom..." such knowledge of things, and such powers of expression..." as all their adversaries were not able to gainsay or resist."

Furnished, however, as they were for the work; yet was there still required an uncommon zeal to undertake it; an undaunted courage to pursue it; and unparalleled pa-b John xiv. 26.

c Ibid xvi. 13.,

⁴ Luke xxi. 15.

tience to bear up against the severe and constant hardships, which every where attended the prosecution of it. "But in all these things the apostles were more than conquerors." For the Holy Ghost inspired and strengthened them with such a degree of courage and sirmness, that they declined no difficulties, dreaded no dangers, shrunk at no trials, in the discharge of their duty; but even "rejoiced, that they were thought worthy to suffer for the name of Christ s."

But notwithstanding the constancy, courage and assiduity of its sirst teachers; a religion, so contrary to the prevailing dispositions of mankind, could, doubtless, make but a slow progress in a sensual world by its own force. Men, immersed in the pleasures of sense, are with difficulty brought to attend to reason. Such can only be instructed by being first assonished; and are scarcely led to obey, till they see it is in vain to withstand. Suitably therefore to this occasion, the Holy Ghost, as was farther necessary, armed the apostles and first converts with the power of working miracles: which, at the same time that they proved and confirmed the truth of their doctrines; awakened the attention, and subdued the reluctance and stubbornness of their hearers.

Rom. viii. 37.

f Acts v. 41.

But as all their hearers might not be equally candid and fincere; as some of them might hold the Gospel in hypocrify; and by a vicious conversation (the natural effect of base principles) might bring a reproach and scandal upon it; and thereby obstruct it in its first rise; so the apostles were moreover endowed, as the nature of the case required they should, with the faculty of discerning the hearts of men; and with the power of inflicting punishments upon them, whenever they practifed such vile deceits. And this power they had occasion miraculously to exert, as we read in the account of Ananias and Sapphira , almost as soon as Christianity appeared. An exertion no less gracious than fevere: not only as it exhibited a general proof of the certainty of their divine mission; but as it particularly served to check the daringness of fraud and impiety, and to deter all base and hypocritical pretenders from presuming to disgrace their company. And accordingly we are told, that "great fear came upon all: and of the rest," who were not sincere in their profession, "no man durst afterwards join himself to them h."

Such were the manifestations, the wonderful manifestations, displayed in favour of the religion of Christ, at its first publication and appearance in the world. And what now was the result? what was the consequence of these wonderful manifestations? Why confessedly this. A religion, that had nothing in it of external charms, nothing in it of pompous allurements; that was quite repugnant to the carnal inclinations, and totally subversive of the settled practices and worldly interests, of mankind: a religion, whose principal article was, to believe in a despised and crucified Saviour: a religion, that proposed nothing to its professors, on earth, but tribulation, affliction, persecution, and death: a religion, preached only by a fet of poor, illiterate, contemptible mechanics; and at the same time opposed, virulently opposed, by the rich, the learned, and the honourable of the world: yet this religion, by the mighty operations and powerful affistances of the Holy Spirit, broke through all restraints and impediments; spread itself with surprising rapidity; and bore down all the powers in its waytill kings after kings became obedient to it; and nations after nations did, and do it, fervice.

270 SERMON XXIII.

Now this rapid and amazing progress of our religion, as it was made, by our account, in consequence of the miracles said to have been wrought and displayed in its favour; so does it manifest our account to be true, and prove those miracles to have been actually exerted. The fact, the surprising success of the Gospel, is acknowledged on all hands: and yet, at its first setting out, there there did not appear, humanly speaking, the least probability of its ever succeeding. It had none of those advantages on its side, which are known to have contributed to the growth and propagation of other doctrines. It contained no foothing, no complying tenets, adapted to the passions and interests of those among whom it was to make its way. It had no support, no encouragement, from the civil power: no countenance, no recommendation, from men of learning, eminence, or repute. It had no force, no cunning, to uphold it; but shewed itself to the world in the meekest and most artless manner; fubmitting its pretences to the strict examination of the curious and inquifitive, through all that prying and enlightned age: yet nevertheless, though utterly destitute of these advantages; and pressed with various accidental incumbrances; it "grew mightily" in a short time; " and prevailed," in the compass of a few years, over the greatest part of the known world.

And now, by what possible means could aregion, so weak and defenceless in itself; a religion, ligion, so contrary to the prevailing customs of the world; and so vigorously opposed by all the power and authority of it; be thus propagated, embraced, and established; but by fuch testimonies and "demonstrations of the spirit," as the first Christians unanimoully affirm to have attended and promoted its progress? These indeed afford us a clear and complete account of the wonderful. change it made in the world: and nothing else can rationally account for it. If we attempt to folyo it in a natural way, we shall foon find, that the course of nature never exhibited any thing like it. In all natural transactions, the event is proportionable to the power of the agent. But here, there is no manner of proportion between the effect and its supposed cause: between the work wrought and the instruments which wrought it. So that were we acquainted with nothing more, than what we read in the former part of the text—that " the Apostles went forth, and preached every where:" and wherever they preached made a prodizious number of converts; we must recessarily conclude.

272 SERMON XXIII.

SERMON XXIII.

273

conclude, according to what is moreover afferted in the latter part of it—that " the Lord worked most powerfully with them, and confirmed their words with figns following." Had "this counsel or this work been of men" only, "it must have come to nought *.' And therefore that it prevailed, and wrought the conversion of for many nations, is entirely owing to the power of God, which operated fo marvelloufly in its favour. Such an extraordinary change, fuch a general revolution, brought about; in fo short a time; by such weak and disproportionate instruments, is itself a miracle; and the greatest of miracles; and does still as evidently assure us, that the preaching of the apostles was attended with the manifestation of divine power, as if we had feen it ourselves exerted by them, in proof and confirmation of what they preached.

How long a time these miraculous powers continued in the church, is a question that cannot

2 Acts v. 28.

Vot. II.

T

cannot easily, and needs not critically, bedetermined. Thus much, however, the nature of the thing itself will suggest; that, . as miracles were conferred, in order to evince the truth of the Gospel; and to promote its reception, at its first setting out; fo were they continued for as long a time, as it stood in need of such credentials. When, the prejudices of mankind began to abate, these extraordinary manifestations, which were defigned to conquer them, we may well suppose, abated likewise; and at length totally ceafed, when Christianity was thoroughly established. Miracles were then of no farther use. For when human learning undertook to display the reasonableness of christianity, and to illustrate the beauties and excellences of its doctrines; when the civil power came in to its support, and honoured the church with its protection and encouragement; these were means sufficiently able of themselves, without the help and concurrence of miracles, to vanquish all the remaining opposition, and to render the Gospel completely victorious.

Atcord-

Accordingly, for a century or more, after the accession of the civil power, it throve and flourished at an exceeding rate; and was in a fair way of making wider and farther advances. But its career was unhappily stopped. The lukewarmness of its profesfors foon brought it to a stand; and their subsequent ambition, luxury, and diffentions caused it gradually to lose ground. what wonder then, if God, in vengeance on . the flagrant fins of that degenerate age, fuffered Mahometanism, with its pestilential train, to make large increachments on the Christian world; and to tear off at once several provinces from the profession of that Gospel, which they had so generally and Mamefully abused; and of which they had discovered themselves to be no longer worthy!

This, however, appears to have been evidently the defect of men and times, and by no means the defect of the Gospel. The Gospel had long before shewed itself able to make its way, provided its professors acted their part, and were careful to discharge their duty. They discharged it not. On the contrary, they difgraced and vilified their profession by the immorality of their lives! and thereby furnished the enemies of our Faith with all manner of advantages against it. These advantages they strenuously embraced; and brought, in consequence, many countries under gross darkness, which had once enjoyed the pure and cherishing light of the Gospel.—An event, though seemingly detrimental to our religion, yet, doubtless, permitted for good ends; and probably ferviceable to its interest at last. It served as a warning, a feafonable warning, to all other christians, not to neglect the practice of the Gospel, for fear it should be judicially withdrawn from them. It might also serve to divert its course from a wavering people, unable "to retain it in the love thereof;" and to make it rebound to other nations. better disposed to cultivate it with steadiness, and to "bring forth fruit with patience 1."

276 SERMON XXIII.

¹ Luke viii. 15.

Several princes, indifcreetly pious, have made attempts to regain the ground, which christianity had lost, by the force of their arms; and to replant the Gospel, in the regions it had lest, with the points of their swords. But alas! that great work is to be accomplished, not by such body wars as these; but by conflicts of another kind, which we must maintain with our own corrupt habits, and vicious inclinations: not by foreign acquisitions; but by domestic victories over those impieties, which at first stopped the growth, and will ever retard the progress, of our holy religion m.

When the conversation of christians is such as becometh the purity of the Gospel; when they sincerely embrace and approve its doctrines, and conscientiously endeavour to obey its precepts; when they unanimously strive to adorn their profession by good works, and to recommend it to others by their virtuous example; then may the Gospel resume itscourse; recover the territories it unhappily lost; and extend its light, influence, and power, to the darkest and most distant regions of the globe:—Then may it go on conquering, and to conquer; "till the kingdoms of the world gradually become the kingdom of Christ 1; and the earth be overspread with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

Bp. ATTERBURY, Vol. I. Serm, IV.

This the Scripture assures us will be sinally the case. And however distant the period, may be, yet are there not wanting some strong presages, some lively indications, of its sure access. The workings of providence manifestly tend towards it; and, in various degrees and methods, are visibly preparing the way for it. Extensive is the progress, which the Gospel has already made; and wide are the countries over which it has prevailed. And where it did prevail, it prevailed more completely than any other religion could; which is a plain proof of its superior excellency. And though it has been forced to quit some places it once pos-m Rev. xi. 15.

[&]quot; Isaiah xk 9.

fessed; yet did it leave a notable quantity of good seed" behind it: which, mixing with the other produce of the soil, helped to correct and improve it; and which, by a proper cultivation, and the savour of the heavens, may spring up hereaster in a plentiful and pure increase. Nay, so penetrating and powerful is the influence of the Gospel, that it has often produced considerable effects, and brought about some remarkable alterations?, even in places where it was sever established; nor indeed formally professed.

In short, it has been always, to use our Saviour's comparison, working, like leaven?

^{*} This is evident from the improvement it made in the notions and fentiments of those heathen moralists, who flourished after its promulgation; such as EPICTETUS, ARRIAN, PLUTARCH, MAX. TYRIUS, MAR. ANTONINUS, HIEROCLES, and Seneca. What influence it had on their forms of devotion may be seen in Dr. Jortin's Discourses on the Christian Religion, p, 228, &c.—To which I shall add one remarkable instance not mentioned by him. It occurs in Arrian, lib. ii. cap. vii. and is no less than Kópis, ilinoos, which was taken from the Christian church, and adopted by the wifer Gentiles. Tòs 9ιὸν ἐπικαλόμεσοι διόμεθα ἀνίδ, Κόριε, iλίπσου. Deum invocantes, presamur eam, Domine misterer nostri.

P Manh. xiii. 33. Luke xiii. 20, 21?

280 SERMON XXIII.

in the mass of mankind; assimulating to itself, in various degrees, their different principles, dispositions, and manners. to its honour be it spoken, it always produced the greatest effects, among those who were most highly polished. In uncultiyated regions it could never thrive: their groffness could not comprehend it. This indeed our two yenerable focieties! have had frequent and repeated occasions to lament. For their success in the conversion both of the Eastern and Western Indians, was by no. means answerable, for several years, to the endeavours employed therein. But, as the one grew more civil and humane, and the other became less averse to our manners and customs, the prospect brightened upon us; and the labours of our missionaries have been equally fruitful, prosperous, and comfortable.

PQf the ancient Fathers pray observe how many were philofophers.

The incorporated fociety "for the propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts," viz. America. And the voluntary fociety "for promoting Christian knowledge," who maintain fix missionaries in the East Indies; and have a call for more, were they able to fend them.

And, fince it has pleased God, by advancing our conquests in both places at once, to open a way for propagating our religion more extensively among them; what a glorious haryest might we expect to reap, had we labourers fufficient for it! "But, alas! the labourers are few:" and we can only " pray the Lord of the harvest," that he would dispose the hearts of those men especially, who draw their wealth from these regions, to strengthen the hands of our religious societies; that they may be able to "fend forth more labourers into his harvest. Then might we hope. that "the name of the Lord would become great among the Gentiles; and that in every place a pure offering would be offered unto him, from the rifing of the fun unto the going down of the same t,!!

But let our hopes of the future prevalence of our religion be what they may; yet still it is urged, "that many large and populous tracts lie at present in the grossest darkness: and, since the Gospel is represented to be so extremely necessary to the Salvation of the world; what is to become of those unhappy people, who could never attain to its saving truths?" The answer is—They are secure in the goodness of a merciful Creator: who, "if he gave but little to them, will require in return but little of them;" and who yet, for the good use they make of that little, will crown them with an happiness, proportioned to their deeds, and equal to the extent of their moral capacities.

Matth. ix. 37, 58.

Mal. i. 11.

$B2 SERMON XXII.

Instead therefore of being over-curious, and needlesly solicitous about their state; let us rather be careful to shew a proper concern for our own. We confessedly enjoy superior advantages; and should consequently labour to excel in our improvements. We are favoured with one "unspeakable gift," for which we can never be sufficiently thankful. We have the pure Gospel of Christ in our hands; and that Gospel proved to be the truth of God. As it comes to us then, supported by the clearest attestations of divinity; let us receive it with more reverence, and obey it with more diligence, for its having having been ratified, confirmed, and established, in so marvellous and unparalleled a manner. Scornfully to reject, or indolently to neglect it, is to ruin ourselves. "For if the word spoken by angels," if the law of Moses, "was stedfast; and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward; how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation? which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him; God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with diverse miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost "."

To which bleffed and glorious Trinity, thus uniting in the support and advancement of Christianity, be ascribed, as is most due, all honour, adoration, and praise, &c. Amen.

* Heb. ii. 2-4.

. . . ÷ • • . .`

S E R M O N XXIV.

2 Cor. iv. 3.

If our Gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost.

When the nature and design of those manifold dispensations, which God exercised towards mankind through the several ages of the world. If we consider the importance of this design, its necessity indeed, for the improvement and happiness of mankind; we shall soon perceive, and be fully satisfied, that it was in no wise unworthy of Almighty God to interpose, interpose, by such great and extraordinary acts, for the success and accomplishment of it. And, if we consider moreover the suitableness and propriety of the acts themselves, and their united tendency to that effect; we shall find sufficient reason to conclude, that they could be the product of no other agency than his, "who is excellent in counsel, as well as mighty in work."

The foundation of this stupendous system is laid, as we have observed, in the fall of man: and the grand intention of it is, to work out his restoration and recovery. Now. as mankind, in consequence of the fall, strayed perpetually into wrong paths; and deviated from time to time into an endless variety of destructive errours; so God prade use of various methods, as the exigence of the case required, to check the progress of their perverseness and disobedience; and to bring them back to truth and righteousness. But of all the errours they fell into, that was the groffest, and most extensively pernicious, which led them to renounce the true God, and to deify the several parts of the the universe: to pay religious homage and adoration to weak and contemptible creatures, instead of worshiping the Almighty Creator; who alone is worthy of the praise and adoration of men. This superstitious worship carried them, according to its natural bent, into the commission of the vilest and most detestable practices; which rendered them daily more and more incapable of true and rational happiness.

Now this state, so entirely foreign to all human felicity, manifestly required former proper provision to be made for its amendment, in the restoration of true religion? and the cultivation of better morals: withour which it was impossible the world should With this view then, God, become happy. in the earlier ages of the world, and through all the times of the Old Testament, was graciously pleased to make several revelations to the fons of men-in order as well to remove their ignorance, and correct their errours; as to improve their religious and moral principles, and to support their hopes of a future and complete redemption.

This-

This chain of revelations was attended throughout by a correspondent chain of miracles: which, at the same time that they confirmed the truth of the feveral doctrines; conspired likewise to prove this general, and, as the case then stood, most necessary article—that Jehovah, the author of them, was the only great and true God, the Creator and Governour of the world? and consequently, that He alone was entitled to the service and obedience of men. For this system of miracles, varying, as we have feen, with every variation of state and circumstances; and yet regularly operating to one great and beneficent defign; exhibits as clear a manifestation of the agency of the Deity, as the system of nature does. Indeed, most of those amazing works, performed under the Old Testament, were so near akin to the works of the creation. that. by a just comparison, they might be known to come from the same hand ". For who but the author of nature, could vary and controul the course of nature in so surprising a manner, and to so gracious an end?

² Bp. Sherlock, Vol. I. Dife. x. p. 283. confroul

If the Deist therefore, who admits the world to have been at first created, and to be still supported, by the hand of God, will be true to his principles; he must admit likewise, that the Jewish dispensation was at first planned, and all along conducted, by the same wise and powerful Being. For, upon what grounds, let me ask him, does he believe the world to be the workmanship of God? Is it because he observes such traces of wisdom in the disposition of its parts, fuch instances of power in the execution of the whole, as no other Being could exert or display? Then, if so, is he not bound, by the very same reasons, to believe the divinity of the Old Testament? For, if the works of nature are acknowledged to be fufficient to prove that God is the author of nature; furely the miracles of the Jewish religion, which are works of fimilar defign, and effects of equal power, must be acknowledged as sufficient to prove God to be the author of that religion. This is a clear and Vol. II. direct ago SERMON XXIV.

direct conclusion. And this conclusion he can no otherwise evade, than by rejecting all the miracles together, as things incredible, false, and sictitious. But the necessity of them for the accomplishment of the end designed; the probability they derive from the circumstances under which they are recorded; the general harmony that runs through them; the connection they maintain with the particular state and condition of the times; and the attestation of ancient history in their favour; not only clear them from all suspicion of that kind, but unite to establish the truth of their existence.

It is an easy matter to raise cavils, and to urge, perhaps, some plausible objections against the evidence of any thing; especially when viewed in a detached light, and considered in a disjointed manner. But let the insidel connect, as believers connect, all the acknowledged and undoubted facts, relating to the Jewish economy, together; and then try to solve or explain them on his own principles; and he will soon find it star beyond the extent of his abilities, not only only to produce a rational account, confident with the faith of history, how they did happen; but even to form any conjectural notion, how they could happen, that will not be clogged with infinitely greater and more perplexing difficulties, than he can ever pretend to alledge against the truth of the Scripture narration. The fum of the argument is this—Either the Jewish occonomy was carried on by the help of those miracles, for which we contend; or its proceeding and gaining its end without them, was the most amazing miracle of all. And therefore, " fince the falshood of the Scripture-account would be more miraculous, than the events which it relates;" we may now hope, from our adversary's own concession, that it may venture, if not to "command," yet at least to lay its humble claim to, "his belief or opinion "."

But be the opinions of men what they will, certain however it is, that the Jewish dispensation did take effect; that " the word of the Lord, the revolution delivered to the children of Israel, "did not return to him void; but," being sustained and confirmed. by attendant miracles, "accomplished that which he graciously designed; and prospered in the thing whereto he fent it z." For it wrought a marvellous change in the world. It gradually dispelled the darkness of superstition: reformed those idolatrous-errours and corruptions, which had long infected his own people; and, by their conversion, brought many others, out of all nations, to the acknowledgement and service of the true God; and to a full expectation of some heavenly guide *; who should improve their understandings, purify their affections, raise them to a nobler and more perfect state, and thereby qualify them for higher happiness.

F Hume's Effays, ubi fupra.

When the Mosaic economy had thus advanced the reformation of the world, and made men capable of a higher administration; when it had effectually reclaimed the Jews from idolatry, and fecured their dependance on the one supreme and true God; when it had impressed on their minds such rational notions of his nature and providence, as qualified them to worship him after a purer manner; -When "the light. of Israel" had reached the Gentiles, and discovered the dimness of natural reason; when it had quickened their defire of farther instruction, and properly prepared them for the reception of it; then it seems to have been the fittest time for the promised Messiah. to make his appearance. For then the world. was in the fittest situation to examine the evidence of his divine mission; to profit by the instructions he should deliver to them; and to convey down the whole of his religion to future and distant ages.

Z Ifaiah lv. 11.

² See Note ^x p. 120. of this volume; and Dr. CLARKE's Ev. of Religion, prop. vii. § 2.

Accordingly, at this seasonable time, Jesus Christ appeared in the world; and brought with him "good tidings of great joy, which" belonged equally "to all people"." He came to be their Saviour; that is, to reform and improve their corrupt nature, and to render them capable of enjoying their God.

Luke ii. 10.

494

To this end, he established such a complete institution of religion, as is not only persective of the former dispensations; but also conducive to the highest improvement, and the most exalted happiness, that mankind can wish to attain.

To animate their endeavours after such improvement, this religion, as we have already shown, assures them, in the first place, of the free pardon of their past transgressions, on the condition of repentance from such evil works, and of faithful obedience for the time to come.

To direct their obedience in a right course, it exhibits, in the next place, a most persect and complete rule of life, adapted to all the circumstances of our stations, and illustrated by the conduct of "that righteous Person," in whom his enemies could "find no fault"; and of whom God

c John xviii. 38.

SERMON XXIV. 295 openly declared, that "in him he was well pleafed d."

To strengthen the infirmities of mankind, and raise their powers to the measure of this rule; it assures them moreover of the aid and affistance of the divine spirit: who is able to support them under all trials; and will, with the concurrence of their own endeavours, lead them safely through this state of probation, to that suture and more important state, in which they are to receive the reward of their deeds.

To make them attentive to the suggestions of the Spirit, to deter them from the practice of vice and impiety, and to engage them in the constant, steady pursuit of all virtue and goodness; it farther lays before them the most powerful and awakening motives, that can ever be proposed to the understanding of men: it opens to their view a clear prospect of that suture state, where "the wicked shall be punished with everlasting destruction, whilst the righteous are crowned with endless felicity."

^{&#}x27;d Matth. xvii. 5.

And finally, to prove "these doctrines to be of God," and delivered to the world by his authority; they all stand attested and confirmed by such a train of apposite "miracles, as no man could" possibly "perform, except God were with him!"

such is the provision which Christ has made, according to the plain, evangelical account, for the happiness and salvation of mankind. And, pray, what is there wanting in this account, to complete his character, as the promised Messiah—the reformer and redeemer of the world? Was he to make an atonement to God for us? Behold then, "he died for our sins, and rose again for our justification." Was he to supply us with the necessary means of salvation? with all things pertaining to life and godli-"ness?" Then behold them all expressly revealed, and powerfully enforced, in the e Matth. xxv. 46.

f John iii. 2.

⁸ Rom. iv. 25.

Gospel. Did the nations of the world stand all in equal need of these benefits? Behold then, he commissioned his disciples to propose and communicate them to all nations. And that his disciples might be able to execute and sulfil the commission they had received, behold them endowed with the gist of languages, to qualify them to instruct the nations. Thus commissioned, and thus gisted, "they went forth, and preached every where; the Lord working with them, and confirming the word by signs following h."

Here now let us pause a little—and then ask ourselves, "what plainer, stronger, more convincing proofs can we possibly require in confirmation of this religion, than those are, which the Gospel offers?" It is manifestly supported by all the internal and external evidences that can well be thought on. Its doctrines are not only correspondent to the necessities of human nature; but also conformable to the highest human reason; and are moreover attested by analogous examples and sensible demonstrations. For our Saviour (as it now, I hope, sufficiently appears) advanced no doctrines, claimed no powers, but such as he openly and repeatedly ascertained by adequate instances and proper illustrations.

Mark xvi. 20.

Had the Gospel required of us to expect salvation by Jesus Christ, and given us no reason to think him equal to the mighty work, insidels might then have laughed with assurance; and have justly reproached our faith as credulity. But now their reproaches be to themselves. It is our boast, as it is our happiness, that "we know in whom we have believed;" even in him, "who is able to save them to the uttermost, that come unto God by him ""—seeing he is the Lord of life and glory; and is invested with sovereign power both in heaven and earth, as he made appear by frequent and repeated exertions of it.

^{1 2} Tim. i. 12.

k Heb. vii. 25.

Since Christ then has given us all reasonable proof, that he was "a teacher come from God:" since the doctrines he taught appear to be in their own nature divine; worthy of God, and beneficial to man: fince he has confirmed them in every branch by the most suitable and appropriate miracles: what apology can we make for . ourselves, " if we reject so great," and at the same time so well-attested, "a salvation?"

But perhaps it will be faid, feveral others, as well as Christ, have brought revelations into the world; and have wrought miracles in confirmation of them; and therefore, that these have an equal right to our belief and acceptance, as the Christian revelation has: fince they were all raifed upon the fame foundation, and are supported by the same credentials.

Now, we readily grant, that various religions were formerly introduced into the heathen world under the pretence of revelation; and that feveral miracles are faid to have been wrought by the founders of thefe religions.

But what then? Is there any comparison to be made between these religions and the Gospel of Christ? View their contents: consider their genius and constitution: what fignatures of divine wisdom, what marks of divine goodness, are there to be discovered in them? What correspondence did they bear with the moral exigences of mankind? what reference had they to pure, folid, and rational happiness? Consider the proofs upon which they stand: examine the miracles alledged in their favour: how mean, trifling, ridiculous, are most of them in themselves! And how poorly are they all attested! And, lastly, consider the fate of these religions: how soon did they vanish, and fink into contempt, when the fecular powers that supported them failed, or knowledge and learning advanced in the world?

With what colour of reason, then, can any man presume to set these weak, pretended revelations in competition with the Gospel of Christ, which made its way in spite of all opposing powers; and has stood the critical examination of ages?—Yea, and ever will fland it. For, could men be perfuaded to lay afide their prejudices and paffions; to approach the Scripture with ferioufness and candour; and to weigh the merits of the Christian cause with deliberation and impartiality; there can be no doubt, but they would, to their happiness, be soon convinced, that the evidence for the truth of Christianity is as full and satisfactory, as the end it proposes is great and desirable. This evidence is likewise so plain and obvious, that any man, of the most common, abilities, may eafily perceive, and readily comprehend it. And therefore, " if the Gospel," or the evidence of the Gospel, " be hid; it is to them that are lost"—blinded by some inveterate prejudice or untoward pasfion, which they are determined to indulge, even to their own ruin.

ever

That this is the real state of the case, evidently appears, not only from the general opposition, which these men make to religion; but more especially from those particular objections, which they urge against it.

They who extol the sufficiency of reason; and cry down revelation as useless; are manifestly lost to a due sense of that weakness and ignorance of the human understanding, which the wisest heathens loudly deplored; and which they ardently wished might be cleared up by the accession of superior light.

And fince the Gospel has brought such light into the world; they who shut their eyes against it, and still "love darkness rather than light;" are entirely lost to that proper concern they ought to have for the establishment of truth and righteousness.

They who dispute the truth of the Gospel; and demand other, and still farther, proofs of its divine authority; are evidently lest to the force and propriety of that sound reasoning, whereby it has been repeatedly and conclusively shewn to carry with it all the evidence, that a divine revelation can be supposed to have.

¹ CICERO, Tusc. Disp. lib. iii. in principio. PLAT. Alcib. ii. in fine.

They who dwell on some fancied defects: and can bring the method and order, the language and file of Scripture, as so many objections to its inspiration; are clearly lost to the beauties and excellencies of good writing; and plainly discover a want of taste fully equal to their want of piety.

And, finally, they who "care for none of these things;" but scornfully reject the Gospel, without either examining its contents, or inquiring into its evidence; are deplorably lest to that just regard, which every considerate and rational person should maintain for his own happiness.

But whether men regard it or not, centain however it is, that God may require them to take notice of some things, even at their peril; to search diligently into them; and no consider them thoroughly. The Gospel is a thing of this kind: for it was delivered under this solemn suchion. When it was proposed to the Jews, it was proposed as the effectual means of salvation, provided they embraced and obeyed it. But not withstanding the numberless and repeated miracles.

m Mark xvi. i6.

² Theff. i. 9.

This let the infidel reflect upon. It is a point of the utmost importance; and a point in which he is deeply concerned. However fecure he may think himself at present; and whatever degree of raillery and contempt he may now be pleafed to pour out on our religion and its Author; yet the time is hastning on, when he shall be forced to contemplate these weighty subjects with other, and different, resentments. With what trembling aftonishment will he come forth, in the day when he shall see that despised Galilean, the meek and holy Jesus; whose name he has blasphemed, whose altars he has profaned, and whose religion and laws he has vilified and traduced; exalted now in the majesty of his kingdom, and bearing rule over every creature! With what terrour and confusion will he behold him seated on the throne of judgment; determining the fate, and adjusting the allotments, of the whole human race? What must his "fearchings of heart" be, when he shall see " the heavens and the earth pass away; and every jot and every tittle of that Gospel he de-Vol. II. X spised.

fpised, confirmed and fulfilled "!" With what agonies of guilt and despair must he and his fraternity approach the offended presence of the Lord; and submit to that terrible sentence of their judge!—" Those mine enemies who would not that I should reign over them, bring them out, and slay them before me?"

May these considerations awaken unbelievers to a due sense of their state and condition! May they prevail upon them to divest themselves of those prejudices and passions, which are not only apt to keep men in ignorance; but also contribute to superinduce an hardness of heart, and a statal contempt of God's word! May they effectually excite themselves word! May they effectually excite themselves and to yield themselves up, whenever it is found, to the falutary influence of its dictates! And may they, who embrace "the truth, as it is in in Jesus', and are admitted into the fellowship of Christ's religion;" be careful to [.] Matth. v. 18. Mark xiii. 31.

⁷ Luke xix. 27.

⁹ Epof. iv. 21.

[&]quot; eschew

" eschew all those things, that are contrary to their profession; and to follow such things, as are agreeable to the fame '!" May they labour to adorn the doctrine of our Saviour: and to recommend it to the world by the excellency of their dispositions, and the amiableness of their conduct! And if we make "our light so to shine before men;" then will they readily perceive, and willingly acknowledge, that there is fomething divine, fomething illustrious and heavenly in it; and will thence be strongly prompted to join us in the worship of that gracious Being, who favoured his fervants with fuch efficacious means of becoming a holy and a happy people.

That this may finally be our state on earth; and that we may all have reason to rejoice together in the hope of a glorious immortality in heaven; God, of his infinite mercy, grant, &c. Amen.

! Collect for the 3d S. after Easter.

₹

